ARSON CASES ARE ON THE INCREASE

Alfred Hogston, State Fire Marshal, has issued a report of Department activities for the months of October and November.

The inspection division made 311 inspections during this period. There were 344 compliances on orders and 84 voluntary compliances. This included the examination of all plans and specifications for school house, institutional and other public construction in the state.

The Arson division made 44 new investigations and further investigated 10 old cases during this period. Sixteen confessions of guilt were secured, 5 cases were submitted to the Grand Jury, 16 arrests were made, 10 cases tried in Court and 9 convictions were secured.

"Arson has been on the increase during the last year, due to business conditions," Mr. Hogston stated. "It is our belief that arson investigators probably reduce arson sixty per cent. The fact that the investigators are present throughout the state discourages would-be incendiaries."

REQUESTS OF LATE JOSEPH R. SECHLER EXECUTED

Last requests of the late Joseph R. Sechler fully executed by his sister, Mrs. Amelia Benninghoff.

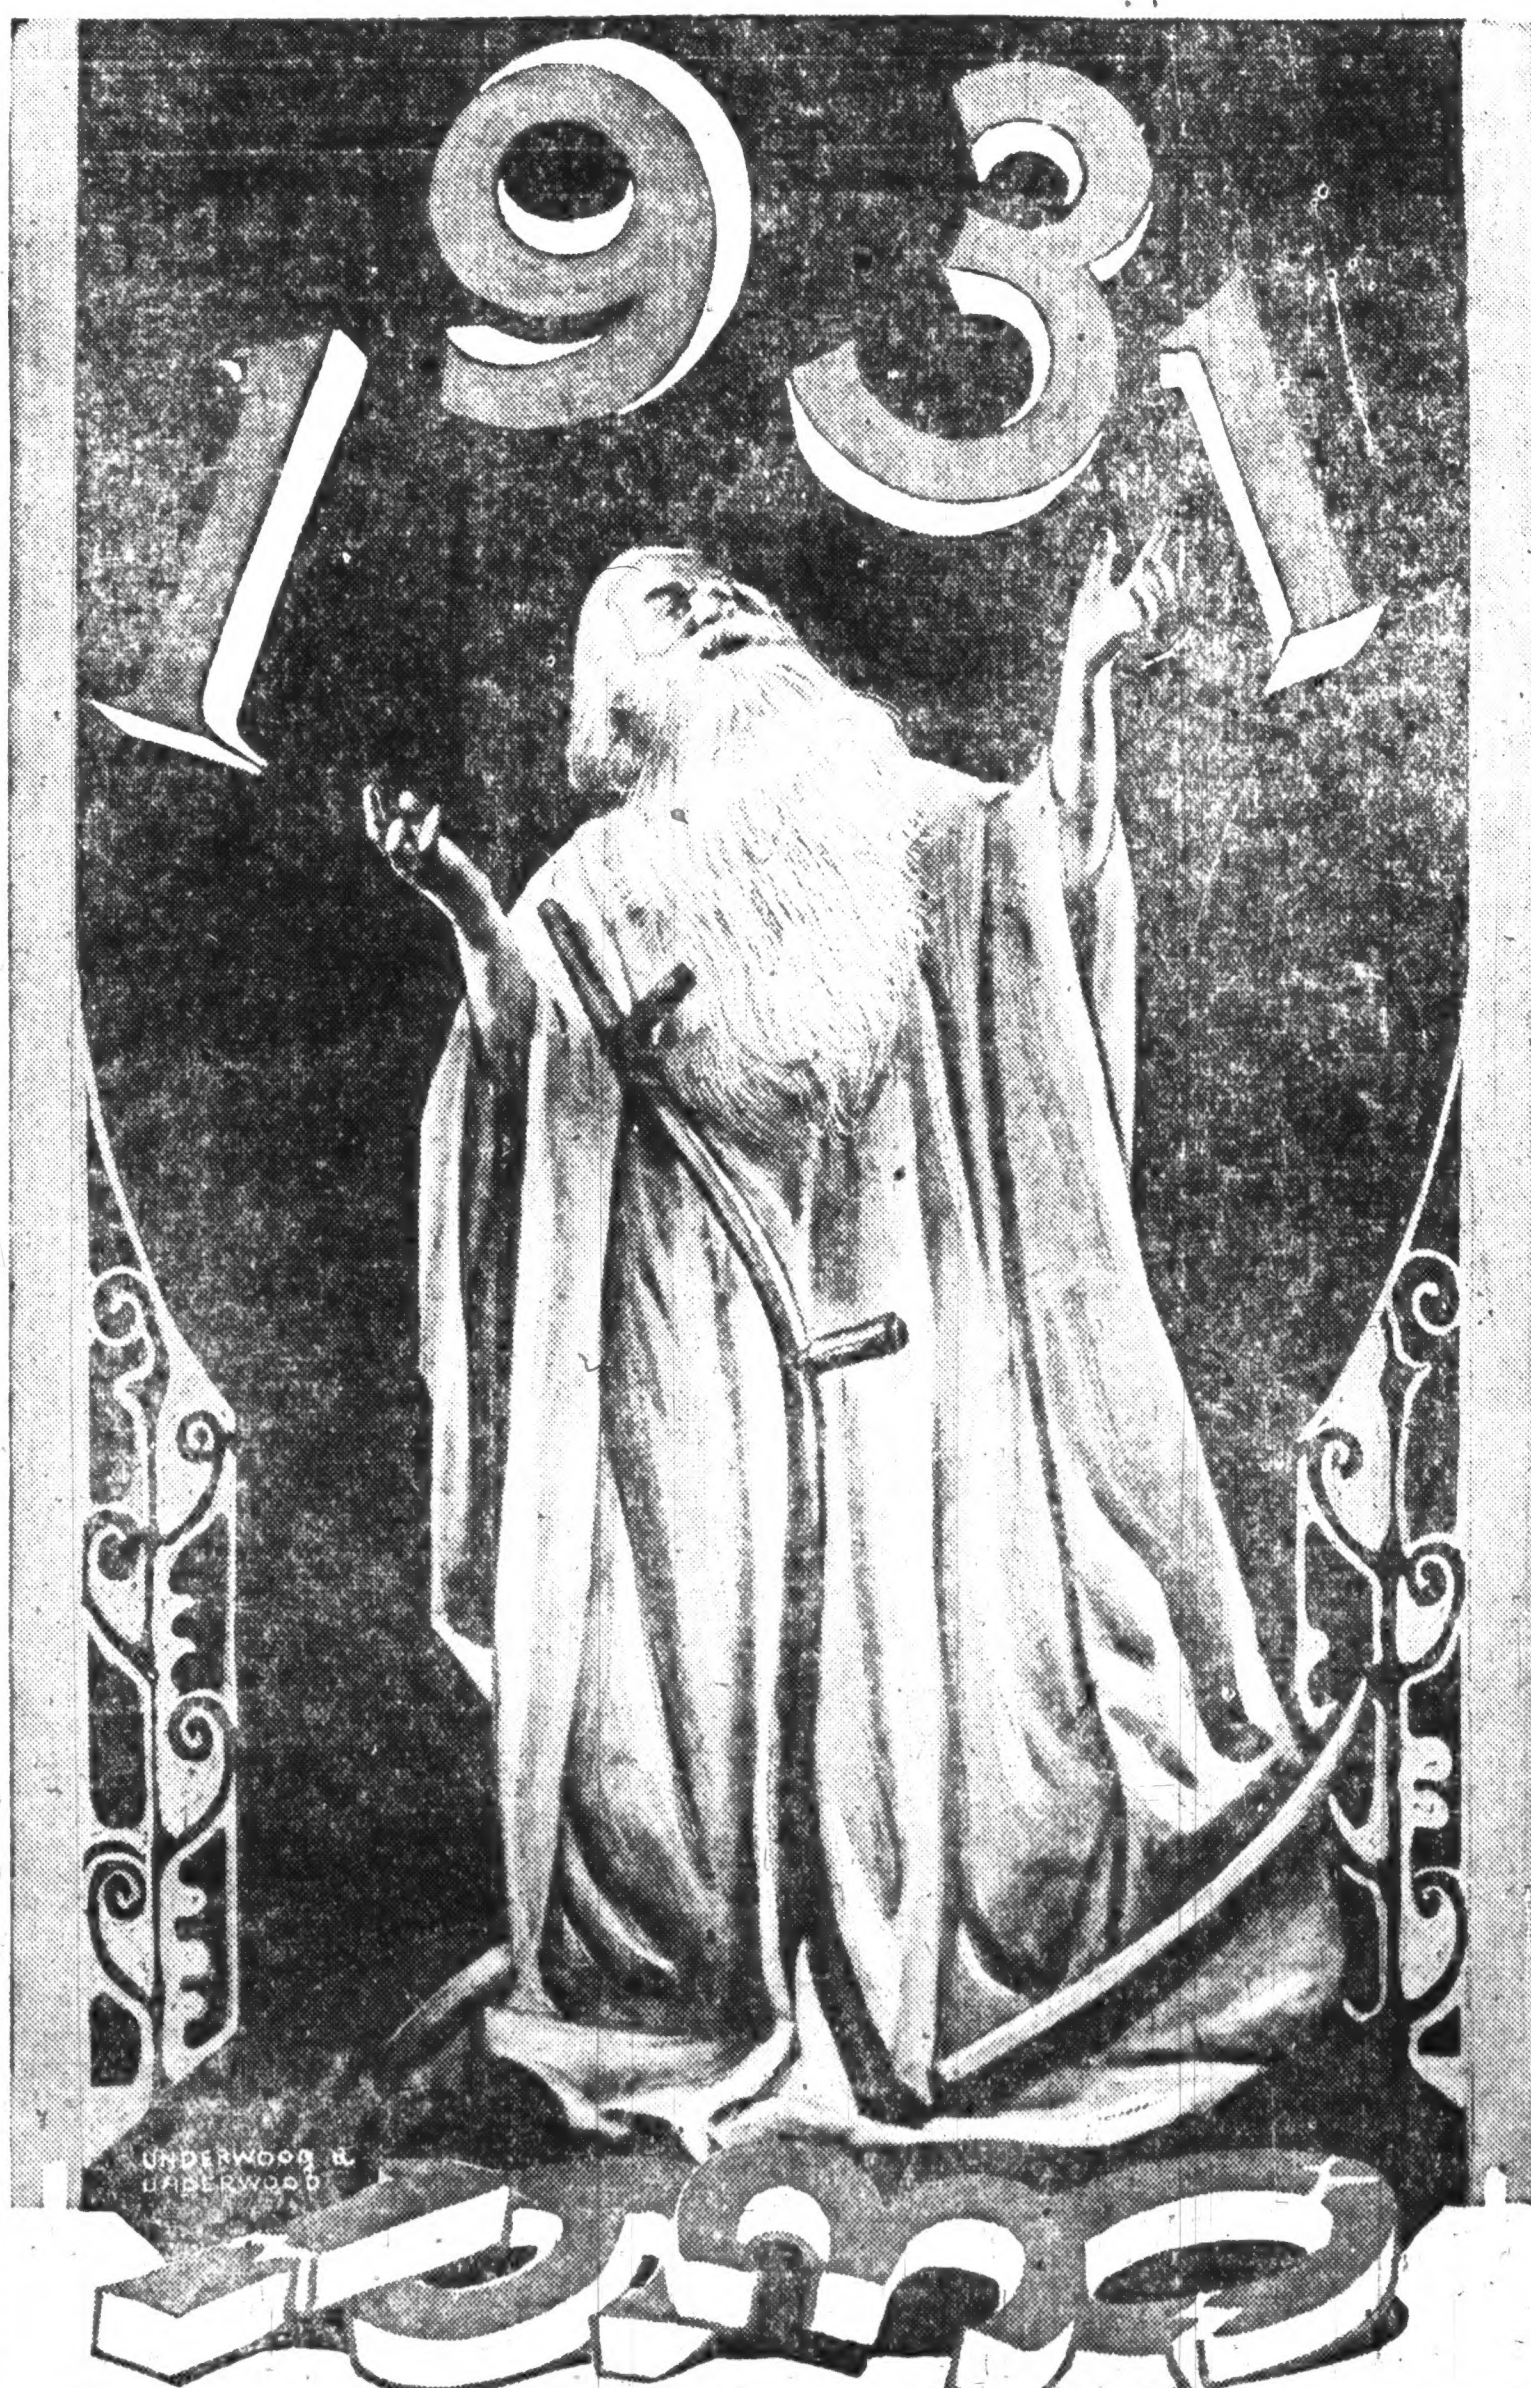

For an amount of money that his mother received from her parents, the Donats of Lehigh County, Pa., he wished each of his cousins, the nieces and nephews of his mother by blood to be given $500 each.

His land he requested to go to Ralph Sechler and Merritt Sechler, fifty acres to the former and forty to the latter. This to be in the Sechler name and as sons of his cousins, the late Frank and Jacob Sechler, having given forty acres of land to Wm. Sechler, a son of the late James Sechler, two years ago.

To Avis Staman he desired that $800 be given and to Agnes Monroe his town residence as an appreciation of their kindness to him.

Merritt Sechler recently returned from Lehigh County, Pa., where he found to be six of the cousins, the youngest 74 and the eldest 88, and to each of whom he presented a check for $500 from Mrs. Benninghoff in honor of her brother, Joseph and memory of their mother, Mrs. Rudolph Sechler.

Deeds have been presented to each for the described real estate and the amount requested given.

Mrs. Staman.

Also in commemorations of the friendship existing between little Jud Keeler and Joe, Mrs. Benninghoff has presented Jud with a paid up, endowment life insurance policy to be paid him at the age of 21 years amounting to approximately $1500.

CONFISCATED MONEY DISTRIBUTED IN COUNTY

Sheriff John Armstrong on a receipt of an order from Judge W. P. Endicott of the DeKalb circuit court Wednesday destroyed five confiscated slot machines. The money found in the machines was distributed by Sheriff Armstrong to charity organizations in all towns in the county to be apportioned among the needy.

St. Joe did not figure in this distribution because of no organization having been formed to meet these needs. Sheriff Armstrong made an investigation before he started to make the distribution.

Judge Endicott is to be commended upon this novel way of handling the situation.

SPECIAL REVIVAL SERVICES AT SCIPIO

Sunday evening marked the opening of a two weeks revival campaign, under the leadership of the pastor, Homer Stidabaker.

Thursday and Friday evenings of this week the pastor of the Colored Baptist Church of Fort Wayne will deliver the sermons.

Violet and Harold Battenberg of near Harlan will sing frequently during the campaign.

The public is invited to

Mrs. Harriett Sechler entertained her children and their families at her home on Christmas Day.

Kain. Weight slips at the scales showed he only received 3,500 pounds, but was charged for two tons, the amount he ordered. He did not receive a weight slip.

"All purchasers of fuel should insist on receiving the gross, tare and net weight records from the dealers handling the fuel for them," C. Barry Tolon, deputy state inspector of weights and measures, said. "If this is done it not only will safe-guard the consumer against short weight, but will prevent attempts to cheat."

"We have found most dealers of the city honest in their sales, and this step merely is to prevent honest dealers from being given a bad name."

Wanted to buy, Fur, Hides and Pelts. Hugh C. Traxler. 112.

Kathleen Gee spent Christmas in the Dell Amstutz home at Harlan.

The members of the Lutheran church held their annual business meeting and supper Tuesday evening.

NOTICE!

Saturday evening at 5 o'clock the Hot Lunch Committee of the Parent-Teacher's Association will sponsor a supper to be served at the high school building, the proceeds of which go toward serving school children otherwise benefited by Hot Lunch. The food obtained will be in the form of donations from persons interested in the project. Your help will be greatly appreciated.

The menu will consist of: Stews, pies, cakes, salads, mashed potatoes and creamed chicken, liver and butter, coffee and cream, milk, baked beans, baked apples, doughnuts, etc.

Donations may be given in any one of the following things: Cakes, breads, pies, corn, milk, eggs, butter, coffee, cream, milk, baked beans, baked apples, doughnuts, etc.

Will trade for livestock a 1920 Ford Roadster, good paint, good condition. Chas. K. ch. 1110.

Pencil-Painting on Stamped Linen

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Yes, we agree with you that this lovely wall-hanger as illustrated looks as if it might be a rare bit of tapestry, borrowed, perhaps, from a collection of priceless art treasures or gracing the walls of a princely home. In appearance it is all that, but here is the amazing truth about this renaissance wall panel—it is merely a matter of stamped linen worked with aquarelle water-color pencils. And the best part of it is that the amateur who does not know the first thing about art can work up these exquisite effects simply by following directions in the use of colored pencils which are sold

Vary the Way of Cooking Winter Vegetables

Winter vegetables need not become monotonous if one takes pains to vary the way they are cooked. Here's a combination of two good foods that can be found in every country store and in any grocery's counter in the country. Yet, when put together they make a tasty dish that seems like something new. This is an excellent accompaniment to roast pork or roast beef—in fact, to any meat dish which gains savor by the addition of cooked apples. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture enumerates the ingredients needed:

6 medium-sized carrots
2 tbs. fat
1 tbs. sugar
6 tart apples
1/4 tsp. salt

Scrape the carrots and cut them lengthwise into thin slices. Pare the apples or leave the skin on, as preferred, core, and cut into slices about a fourth of an inch thick. Place a single layer of the apples and the carrots in a large skillet with the fat, cover tightly and cook until well browned, turn and brown the other side. Just before the cooking is finished sprinkle with the sugar and salt. Serve on a hot platter, first a layer of carrots, then a layer of apples, so the two can be lifted together.

Lemon Has Variety of Uses in Any Household

The lemon has a variety of uses in the household aside from that of food. A slice of lemon kept near the sink in the kitchen is useful for removing fruit and vegetable stains from the hands, and helps to keep them smooth and soft.

A half lemon placed in the washing machine makes the laundry beautifully white.

Lemon juice and salt rubbed on an iron-scorched spot on white garments, then placed in the sun, will remove the spot.

It is excellent as a dentifrice, and makes a refreshing mouth wash.

Used in the bath it softens the water and gives a delightful feeling of freshness and exhilaration.

Lemon juice is healing to small sores or cuts, even though the first sensation may not be so pleasant.

In most all fancy work departments for this type of work.

Besides wall hangers depicting various scenes, linen pictures can be had for framing, also pillow tops. However, now that interior decorators have in this day and age revived the vogue for wall hangers and are placing so much emphasis on their effectiveness, we selected this very pretty specimen as a most timely theme.

The idea in brief is that by moistening the linen and working with the colored pencils according to the printed chart which comes with each subject the tones and tints resolve themselves into a most exquisite water-color effect.

Materials for this work include a small brush, a box of colored pencils, the stamped linen piece (every pattern has a chart attached giving the color scheme) also material for lining. The first step is to dip the brush in water and moisten a small portion of the design. Then work over with the pencils using the chart as a color guide. The little panel centered in the illustration indicates this chart in miniature. On the original, tiny letters are printed "B" for black, "Y" for yellow and letters in combination when two colors are to be blended. To make a stronger effect the pencil itself is dipped in water.

Puffs of Locomotive

For every revolution of its driving wheel a locomotive gives forth four separate puffs. These are made by the rapid sending out of waste steam from the smokestack. A locomotive with a wheel of average size going 50 miles an hour gives out 800 puffs a minute. When there are more than 18 per second the human ear can no longer distinguish them.

Some Good Things for the Table

By NELLIE MAXWELL

Burly, dosing humble bee,
Where thou art is mine for me.
Let them call for Porto Rique,
Far off heats through seas to seek;
I will follow thee alone.
Thou art a most torrid zone
Zigzag steers, desert cheerer,
Let me chase thy waving lines;
Keep me nearer, me my hearer,
Singing over shrubs and vines.
—Emerson.

When making pastry prepare more than is needed and place in a cold place or ice chest, tightly covered with waxed paper. The thoroughly chilled mixture makes more flaky crust than that baked at once. From this pastry a few tarts may be made in a hurry, or cheese straws, a meat pie, using leftover meat.

Ice box rolls are another special than can be mixed and left in the ice chest for a week. Take off just the amount needed for rolls and put them to rise; when light, bake. A tin of delicious rolls are quickly served. Wash the heads of lettuce and place in a cloth or covered dish in the ice chest, then the lettuce will always be ready for use. Parsley well washed, will be available for cream potatoes. They are fully as good as those freshly cooked.

By keeping jars of chow chow, capers, olives, pickles as well as cheese, celery, anchovies and numerous other condiments and relishes, one has access to delightful fillings for sandwiches which need to be made in a hurry. A jar of mayonnaise and a bottle of french dressing should be made in such quantities that they are always available. It takes very little extra effort to double the amount when preparing a salad dressing, and then there is always a supply.

Wash the heads of lettuce and place in a cloth or covered dish in the ice chest, then the lettuce will always be ready for use. Parsley well washed, leaving the moisture clinging to the leaves, if put in a fruit jar tightly covered, will keep two weeks, fresh and green. Add a bit of water if it seems to dry out.

To make lime water take a piece of fresh lime the size of an egg, put in a fruit jar and cover with a quart of water. Let stand overnight, drain off the water, bottle and keep in a cool, dry place.

Cream to whip should be very cold and at least a day old.

Hard Sauce.—Cream one-fourth pound of butter, add gradually one cupful of powdered sugar. When light and white, add one unbeaten egg white and beat five minutes. Add nutmeg.

Vegetable Fritters With Cold Sliced Meat

Nothing like crisp vegetable fritters as an addition to a plate of cold sliced meat of any sort. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture tells how to make celery fritters:

1 1/2 cups sifted soft 1 egg wheat flour 1 cup milk
1/4 tsp. salt 2 cups chopped
2 tsp. baking pow- 1 celery
der 1 tbs. melted fat

Sift together the flour, salt, and baking powder, add the beaten egg, milk, celery, and fat. Fry the celery fritters in deep fat or, if preferred, in a shallow pan. In either case drop the mixture by spoonfuls into the fat and fry rather slowly. The fritters need time to cook through to the center before the outside becomes too brown. Drain the fritters on absorbent paper and serve hot.

Teaching Children to Feed Themselves

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Several good results are obtained by teaching children, from the earliest age, to feed themselves and take part in such activities as laying their own places and carrying food to and from the table. They soon learn, also, to help mother by setting the table for many meals and putting away silver and other clean utensils and dishes after meals.

The most important effect of encouraging self-help at meal times is of course on the child himself. He develops steadiness in his muscles and self-confidence as he gradually becomes able to manage a plate, or glass, or tray containing both, without spilling anything. The little boy in this picture from the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture is only three, and he has reached a point where he can safely carry his own lunch from the kitchen to his little table. He calls it "playing cafeteria."

The joy of accomplishment in doing this means far more to a little child than an adult often realizes. Sometimes mothers who are in a hurry to get work done, say "Here, I can do it quicker," or "I'm afraid you'll spill it—mother will carry it for you." What if he does spill a little food on a washable tray? He can learn not to with a little practice. Let him start by carrying one dish not easy to tip—a bowl of cereal, or a plate of vegetables. The first time he carries his entire lunch without spilling a drop, he needs a little praise; he will try to do it as well every time.

A child as young as fifteen months can be given his own spoon and fork to fit his small hands, and a chance to practice eating. Feeding himself will be slow, awkward, and spilly at first, and the mother is constantly tempted to save time and muss by taking the spoon away and feeding him herself. But this only postpones the child's independence. If his clothing is protected by a large bib, and the floor and table are washable, a few accidents do not matter.

In a very short time the second benefit from the child's new accomplishment will be evident—the mother's time will actually be saved many times over, while the little one progresses from the stage of learning to manage a spoon up to the point where he can carry a tray, pour out and carry a glass of milk, and finally, carry two things at once if they are not too heavy.

The lunch for the little boy in the picture consists of sandwiches—bread and butter with finely chopped lettuce as filling—creamed beans, and a pan-broiled meat ball; milk; and a simple dessert of rice and cooked fruit.

People just don't distinguish

It's utterly unfair, of course. But if a man will smoke an outrageously strong pipe, nobody is going to get close enough to him to appreciate his heart of gold. Don't keep potential friends at a distance. Sir Walter Raleigh's favorite blend is incomparably rich and fragrant—yet so mild as to be acceptable to the most fastidious pipe-smoker. Nor does Sir Walter lack body and real flavor. They're all there in Sir Walter Raleigh—as you'll discover when you try it.

IT'S 15¢—and milder

Finds Greenland Once

Was Tropical Country

Dr. Laugel Koch, Danish explorer, has returned to Copenhagen from an exploration of Greenland with evidence that Greenland was once a tropical country. Koch and two assistants explored the coastline of north Svalbard to Denmark. The exploration is regarded as important because it shows inhabitants new routes to north Greenland. Koch brought back the largest collection of specimens ever taken from Greenland, eight tons of fossils, plants and animals showing three geological periods. Some specimens indicated that at one time there was tropical life on Greenland, such plants as palms growing in abundance. Signs of numerous hot springs and rich animal life were found.

Evening Fairy Tale for Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

You could have told from Letty's eyes that she was a very bright bird. The eyes of the bird always show just how much wisdom and intelligence the bird has, and Letty proved that she had a great deal.

When any one spoke to her, her eyes looked very bright. They watched the person who was speaking to her, showing she was listening and paying attention.

If her eyes had wandered all about she would have shown she was stupid. A bird is very much like a person

Never, Never Still.

In this way. When you speak to people and they let their eyes gaze on anything and don't pay attention to any one thing they're not so bright and keen.

Letty belonged to a little girl named Alice. Now Alice fed her parrot some very nice seeds and bits of corn. Letty thought she had fine food, and every day after lunch Letty would have a place of cake.

It was a small place but it was extremely good! Letty learned to say almost everything after a while. My, what a talker she became.

And she wanted to show Alice how pleased she was with everything so she chattered pleasantly most of the time.

When callers would come they would ask if the parrot was ever still, and then Letty would say:

"Ever still? No, never still."

They always laughed then, and did not mind her chattering. For after they had been there a little while Letty muttered and said things in very low tones so as not to disturb any one.

It was night time and Letty had her head under her wing. Sometimes she slept this way, just as a canary would sleep.

But often she would huddle up on her perch and dose off with her head drooping down a little on her chest.

But this night she was sound asleep and her head was hidden away—while she was dreaming of seeds and cake and all the goodies that parrots love.

All of the family were asleep when Letty seemed to notice something strange.

She didn't like the smell that came to her. Now she was wide awake. She didn't want to disturb the family. She was a good parrot, and never disturbed any one who might be sleeping.

But this she knew was not right. She was sure of it. The smell became stronger and there was something rather frightful about it.

She got off her perch and went into the room where Alice's daddy slept. Then she shrieked at the top of her parrot voice.

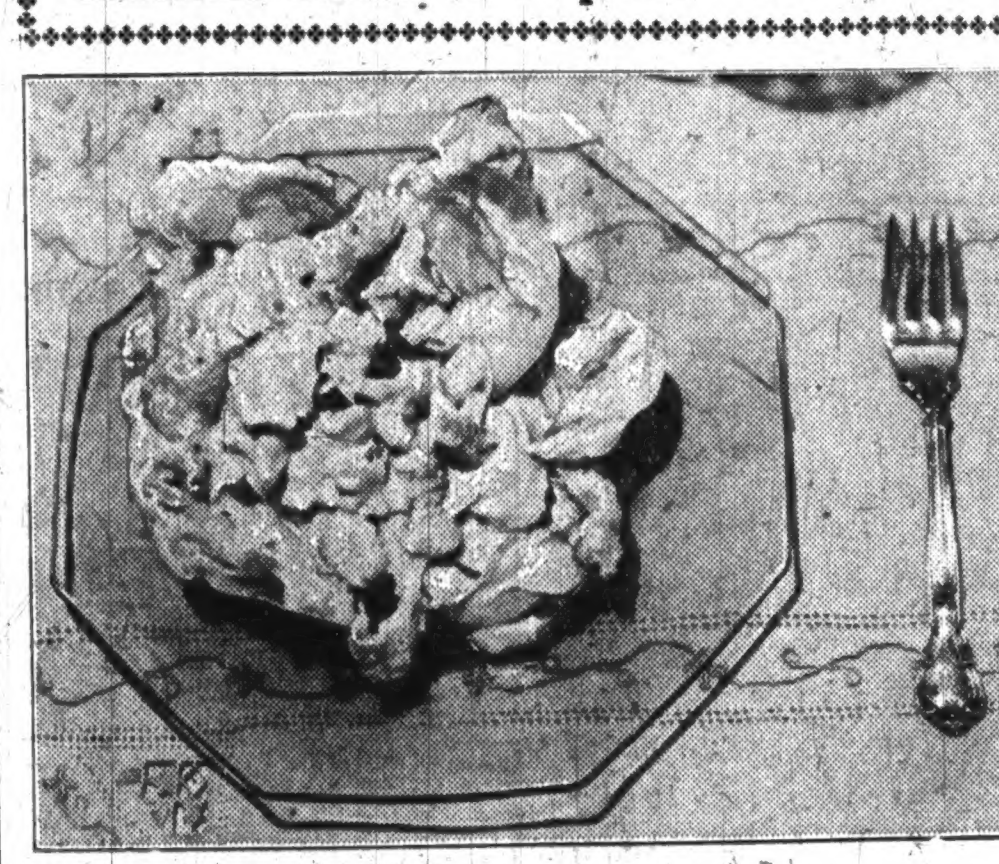

"Never, never still. Never still, never still."

Alice's daddy woke right up. So did the other members of the family.

And it was Letty who saved them all. She had smelt fire and if Alice's daddy hadn't noticed right away the spark that had come out of the fireplace, which hadn't been put out as carefully as usual, would have set fire to everything.

Chicken Salad Is Popular for Lunch

Chicken Salad Is One of the Most Delicious Dishes.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

"Again she ordered chicken salad." The cartoonists have made chicken salad a national by-word, through poking fun at the inexperienced young girl who does not know exactly what to choose on the restaurant menu, with its French names for ordinary dishes and sauces she never heard of. Nevertheless, to order chicken salad shows common sense in more ways than one. At its best chicken salad is one of the most delicious dishes known to man. Even in a restaurant of no special distinction it will be one of the most satisfactory orders, for the method of making it is widely understood and the chief ingredients—cooked chicken, celery, lettuce and salad dressing—are obtainable almost anywhere.

There are a few points about putting chicken salad together, however, that make all the difference between well-flavored and indifferently flavored results. One is the slight suggestion of onion flavor in the vinegar.

Chicken Salad.

A fowl weighing 1 sliced onion about 5 pounds, salt or 2 smaller Mayonnaise dressing 1 egg 1 cup milk 1/4 tsp. salt 2 cups chopped 1 celery 2 tsp. baking pow- 1 tbs. melted fat der

Stimmar the chicken until tender in a small quantity of water. When about half done, add a teaspoonful of salt. Let the chicken cool in the broth. After it is cold remove the skin, strip the meat from the bones and cut it into small pieces of even size. In the meantime allow a few slices of onion to soak in a cupful of mild vinegar to give the vinegar a slight onion flavor. Remove a cupful of chicken fat from the cold broth and mix with this vinegar. Pour this mixture over the chicken, adding more salt and vinegar if needed to season it well. A few drops of tabasco improve it. Let this stand, or marinate, for several hours, or overnight. Cut the celery stalks or overnight. Cut the celery stalks into small pieces and let stand in a cold place until crisp. Mix enough thick, well-seasoned mayonnaise dressing with the chicken to coat the pieces well. Shortly before the salad is to be served, add the celery and more mayonnaise if needed. Stir the mixture lightly so as not to break up the chicken. Add still more salt if needed. Pile the salad lightly on crisp lettuce and serve at once.

If desired, add one-quarter cupful of capers when the celery and chicken are combined. Hard-cooked eggs may be used as a garnish or cut in pieces and mixed with the chicken to make it go further.

A Santa Monica woman has at last become the champion of her sex. She had been subpoenaed as a witness and the court, before she began her testimony, instructed her as follows: "You must be very careful, madam, to state only what you actually saw and know. There must be no hearsay evidence." He then signaled for the prosecutor to go ahead.

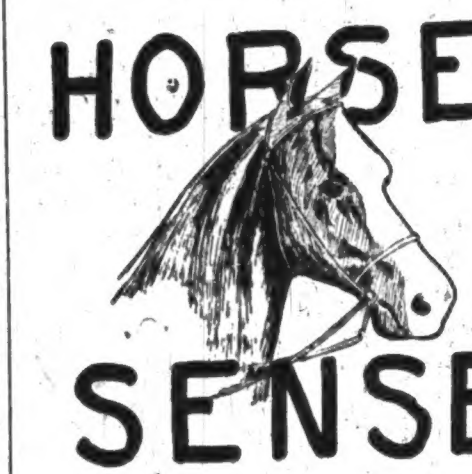

"What is your age?" asked that worthy.

"I cannot answer," cooed the lady.

"I have only hearsay knowledge on that point,"—Los Angeles Times.

Evil Omen of Friday

Friday the thirteenth has long been regarded as an evil omen. The idea is 2,000 years old. Jesus was crucified there, were thirteen at the table. Therefore, Friday the thirteenth means double trouble, and probably will as long as the Christian religion endures. In connection with this, it is said to be unlucky for thirteen people to sit down to the table for dinner for one of them will die within a year.

A New Year's Resolution

by
Wm. G. Gaston

IT WAS New Year's night in the suburbs of a small town. The shadowy forms of two men were sinking into the deeper darkness, under a clump of trees. They waited for some time with growing impatience. Presently a low, shrill whistle sounded. One of the men answered. The form of another man cautiously approached the two. "How does the land lay, Bill?" asked one of the men of the newcomer. "Nothing doing," replied Bill. "I can't help it, boys, but it's all off so far as I am concerned." There was an awkward pause, then Bill continued: "I know that you will think that I am yellow. You can shoot me if you want to, but I am out of it. You can go ahead with the job and there will never be a squeal from me. When my mother died I promised her I would be a man. She has been on my mind all day. I am going straight. That is my New Year's resolution."

A volley of oaths rolled from the tongues of the two men. Their plans had been upset. Bill had been their companion for ten days and had engaged to be their accomplice in a bank robbery about to be pulled off. The two men—hardened criminals—knew that a large shipment of money had been received at the local bank and New Year's night would be a good time to blow the vault. The two men were experts in the profession. Bill had drifted in with them after he had tramped for a few weeks, begging for something to eat from house to house. Discouraged, he had decided to "throw in" with them and he was to have driven the car in which they proposed to get away after the job was finished. "I'm not yellow," continued Bill. "I am going to get out of here and go straight. There will never be a word from me about either of you nor this job." With this Bill turned and started out into the night. They called to him to stop, but Bill did not stop. A shot rang out and a bullet whistled uncomfortably close to Bill's head. He ran and was soon lost in the darkness.

"I Want Work," He Said. "I Must Have Work."

The next morning Bill crawled out of an old shed and washed his face in the water. He started to hunt for work. He was determined to find work. A neat little cottage attracted his attention. He knocked at the back door and asked the good looking young woman who came to the door for work. "I want work," he said. "I must have work." He made the statement with such evident sincerity that the young woman scrutinized him carefully. "All right," she said. "You can shovel a road through that snowdrift back of the coal house so the coal man can put in a load of coal this afternoon."

Bill went to work. He worked with a vision of the young woman and his new resolution in mind. In an hour the road was shoveled out. He was conscious that a pair of brown eyes had been watching him out of the kitchen window. The work was hardly finished before a call came from the back porch. Dinner was ready. In the kitchen was a small table with plates laid for two. Bill sat down and tried hard to eat as if he was not very hungry. Slowly the young woman wormed out of him part of the story of his life. There was no hint of the job he had come to town to pull off. He must have work and he was going to work in that town.

Bill did work. He got a job through the influence of the young woman. He made good. He bought better clothes. He made a good appearance. A real estate firm offered him a position as salesman. He made a good land salesman and soon his commissions began to pile up. He saved money. In two years he was a member of the firm and more than that, he sat at the head of the table in the neat little cottage where he found his first work. The cottage had been enlarged.

In just twelve years from the day Bill started to put his new resolution through, he was elected president of the bank that he came to town to help rob.

To the Old and New Year

By Laura F. Armitage, in Kansas Farmer.

O YEAR that is going, take with you Some evil that dwells in my heart; Let selfishness, doubt, With the old year go out— With joy I would see them depart.

O year that is coming, bring with you Some virtue of which I have need; More patience to bear, And more kindness to share, And more love that is true love indeed.

O year that is going, take with you Impatience and wilfulness—pride; The sharp words that slice From these too hasty lips, I would cast, with the old year, aside.

O year that is coming, bring with you More charity unto the weak— A deep, growing peace, That never shall cease— Of these things I surely have need.

Fortunes at a New Year's Party

by Helen Gairford

MARCIA WESTOVER dropped the "Help Wanted—Female," in her lap with a sigh. She just didn't eat, and that was all. And then, among the "Personals," she saw the ad.

"Palmer wanted for New Year's party. Good pay, Apply 2205 Sunrise Drive."

Marcia read it through twice. "Gee," she thought, "I bet there'll be eat, too!" So she made up for her first job as a fortune teller.

In a gay corner sat the pseudo gypsy girl. "I see a feather in your cap," she gravely told a bejeweled matron. "Some one is very jealous of you."

She paused. "You have had your cross to bear, too, but all will come out right. Do not worry." She looked up. "Have I not told you true?"

"Yes, every word," replied the other, and rising, gave way to a young man who had been standing nearby. He looked at her accusingly. "You've said the same thing to everybody."

"All said it was true," she reminded. "Well, yes. But you're not going to see a feather in my cap, are you?"

She laughed. "I'll try to be more original." With a trembling finger she traced the lines in his hand. "Things are not what they seem," she began.

"I wondered," he answered, gazing into her dark eyes. "I see romance coming to meet you. A girl with brown hair and brown eyes—"

"With a tiny, dainty hand," he asked, "very sweet and very clever?"

Marcia blushed under his gaze. "Perhaps. I cannot tell. But it is love at first sight."

"Yes—go on, I am interested."

"I see you very happy."

"Well, yes, she is."

"I'm afraid."

"Pleasant." He held her fingers.

"She's just a jobless orphan, broke and hungry."

"Well, let's eat."

"Me?"

"Of course. You know and I know that you're the girl. The minute I saw you I knew that nothing else mattered."

He drew her behind the pot-palms. "Tell me, tell me, do."

She smiled up at him. "The New Year looks very bright," she said.

The Air Pilot's New Year's Visit

by Mary Graham Bonner

MARGARET CARY was very beautiful. She had pink cheeks and blue-gray eyes and soft brown hair. Her arms were so dainty, and her throat was soft and white and looked as though it should be a subject for the poets or the painters or the sculptors. And her hands were small and graceful.

She was very fond of John Robinson—not any fonder of him than John Robinson was of her.

He was an old pilot, and in all sorts of weather he flew with the mail. He always made light of everything, but from others she had heard how brave he was, how marvellously he managed his plane in any kind of a storm, how he always thought of others.

But none of this John Robinson told to Margaret Cary. He only told her that all that he did was a matter of routine, his work.

She did not live near where he flew his route, but was hoping to see him. He had not been able to get to her for Christmas. He had been too busy—too busy thinking of others. And in a way it had hurt her feelings.

She had felt that he should have come to her—she who could command so many could not command him.

And now it was storming so hard perhaps he would not be able to make the trip to see her for New Year's. But if he didn't come she would never feel the same toward him. It was unreasonable she knew. But she cared for him—more than for any of the others, and the others looked to her house and he had not come. And there was doubt that he would come. Then he arrived. She heard the humming of the plane; she saw him landing.

She saw him come into the house, the icicles attached to his helmet, his face ruddy, and eyes twinkling.

And in the look of his eyes—those eyes that showed how deeply joyous and happy he could be—and in his sincerity, his fineness, she knew how much she loved him.

"Happy New Year," they greeted each other—and murmured words for each other alone.

And then—Margaret Cary, darling—next Christmas we'll be together and all the New Years following."

He looked up for a moment. Perhaps it was because so much of his life was spent above the ordinary level—perhaps it was instinctive romance—but he looked up and saw the mistletoe.

"The mistletoe and its significance," he said.

They both understood, and the mistletoe hung over Margaret Cary and John Robinson as they pledged their devotion under the green leaves and white berries.

Sunday School Lesson

Lesson for January 4

THE BIRTH OF JOHN THE BAPTIST

LESSON TEXT—Luke 1:3-17, 88.

GOLDEN TEXT—And thou, child, shalt be called the prophet of the Highest: for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his way.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Gratitude for Godly Parents.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Gratitude for Godly Parents.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Need of Physical and Spiritual Equipment for the Lord's Work.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Value of Training in the Desert.

1. The Parents of John the Baptist (vv. 5-7).

1. When they lived (v. 5). "In the days of Herod the King." While both were of the priestly line, the priesthood was very corrupt and the ruling classes most wicked. Zacharias and his wife lived a time when it was not easy to be godly.

2. Their character (v. 6). "They were both righteous before God." They were so pious that they walked in the commandments of the Lord blameless. The highest good in wedded life can be attained only when both are united in Jesus Christ. John the Baptist had a godly heritage.

3. They were childless (v. 7). Though this godly couple possessed the joy of the Lord, there was a real lack on their home. No home is quite ideal into which no child has come.

Capacity for Good in Life's Ordinary Evils

I have no more notion of abolishing evil than I have of abolishing shadow in the world of light, Lewis Mumford writes, in the Forum and Century. Fourier's belief that the ocean itself under a harmonized social order would turn into lemonade, and Spencer's picture of the future society as a sort of polite eternal Sunday afternoon, are merely exhibitions, as it were, of an unfathomable shallowness.

Evil and good are phases in the process of human growth; and who shall say which is the better teacher? Illness, error, defeat, frustration, disintegration, malicious accident, all these elements are as much in the process of life as waste, nutrition and repair. The very forces which, if triumphant, would destroy life are needful to season experience and deepen understanding.

Observing this, the popular religions of the past have celebrated almost solely the negative aspects of existence. But, in release from their superstitions, one must not commit the opposite error of neglecting the role of evil and forgetting its value. Customs and actions we habitually call good have large capacities for mischief; who does not know the charity that poisons the giver and the purity that offends common decency?

Similarly, the evils of life have a large capacity for good; and the mature person knows that they must be faced, embraced, assimilated, and that to shun them, or innocently hope to eliminate them, is to cling to an existence without perspective or depth—a child's picture done in pretty chalks, charming perhaps, but only that.

Like arsenic, evil is a tonic in grains and a poison in ounces. The real problem that justifies every assault upon war and poverty and disease, is to reduce it to amounts that can be spiritually assimilated.

Beacon Lights Set to Save Migratory Birds

Because of the increasing number of casualties among migratory birds, German and Dutch lighthouses have taken precautionary measures to save the lives of feathered wanderers. Birds often dash themselves to death against the lanterns of lighthouses. Casualties have been particularly numerous at the great light of Heligoland, which is located in the center of the main migration paths.

With the aid of ornithologists, various lighthouse departments in Europe have installed rings of lights around the towers, to illuminate the ramparts, railings and cupolas, thereby warning the birds of danger. The new lights give the birds some landmarks other than the blinding eye of the lighthouse itself. The system is said to have reduced the number of bird casualties. The migrating birds see the ring of lights, find perches on which to rest and then take to the air again for their destination.

"Come-Back" for the Horse There are positive indications that the horse is returning to favor throughout France, and particularly in Paris. In the French capital more and more horses are appearing on the streets every day. The explanation is that the traffic is so congested that for delivery purposes the automobile has ceased to have any advantage. It cannot be economically used unless it can be kept moving. Under these circumstances the horse makes a better showing than the car. It does not represent as great an investment and its life of usefulness is longer.

Take Your Choice Willie—Pop, what's the difference between a Red and a Conservative? Pop—A Red, my boy, is a violent character, who believes in using force to put his theories into effect. The Conservative, on the other hand, relies principally on force.

And I'll Help "I'm not asking anything for myself," said the colonel's only daughter in her prayers one night, "but please, give Father a son-in-law." Army and Navy Journal.

Ideals are like stars; you will not succeed in touching them with your hands, but like the seafaring man on the desert of waters, you choose them as your guides, and following them, you reach your destiny.—Carl Schurz.

Fear Gives Way to Faith Nothing so demoralizes the forces of the evil as fear. Only as we realize the presence of the Lord does fear give way to faith.—Sarah Smiley.

Europe Can No Longer Sneer at American Art

Architect Whitney Warren said at a dinner in New York the other day:

"Europe sneered once at American art, but the tables are turned now. An American architect disembarked at Southampton, and on the train ride to Waterloo he fell asleep. But the whistle of the engine awakened him as the train passed through Woking, and he stared out at the town's architectural horrors and said:

"Good heavens, what is this?" "This is Woking," said an Englishman.

"The American leaned back and shut his eyes again. He muttered: 'If this is Woking, let me dream again.'"

Small Boy in Luck A passenger train stopped in Ocean City, Md., long enough for the trainmen to rescue eight-year-old Ernest Hastings from beneath the locomotive. The train, rounding a curve, plowed through a group of small boys playing on the track. All got out of danger except Hastings, who was seen to fall beneath the rails and disappear under the cowcatcher. It was found, however, that the lad had squeezed flat upon the ties as the lower section of the engine passed over him. Except for a small cut he was uninjured.

Prospects and Conditions for 1931

Robert P. Lamont, Secretary of Commerce, in Response to Requests for a Statement of Conditions and Prospects for the Coming Year, Issued the Following Statement

Prior to the close of 1929 a world-wide decline in raw material prices and a collapse of security values ushered in a period of general business unsettlement. In the latter months of the year production was curtailed, building fell off, and industrial employment was reduced. But many evidences of business improvement appeared in the early months of 1930. Building construction increased and there was an upturn in the production of automobiles, steel and other basic products. Security prices swung upward and commodity prices were temporarily halted in their decline. Toward the middle of the year, however, it became clear that production in certain raw material areas had been setting too rapid a pace and that economic disturbances in several quarters of the world would enforce further declines and lessen still more the purchasing power of important world markets. At home the early evidences of stability gradually began to disappear beneath the currents of world-wide depression, while a period of severe drought gave still greater momentum to those cumulative forces which were bringing heavy losses of purchasing power to a substantial portion of our people.

As the rate of decline in raw material prices became more highly accelerated industry confined its purchases more and more to current needs. The universal drop in industrial production was followed by increasing unemployment and a decline in consumers' demand in both foreign and domestic markets. Toward the end of the year these cumulative forces were rapidly running their course and the apparent retardation in the rate of downward movement in several basic indexes of business supports the belief that the elements of recession have now spent most of their force.

The effect produced by the world-wide depression can be seen in the year's indexes of business. The Federal Reserve Board's index of industrial production, which comprises all the basic mineral products and all important groups of manufacturing goods and which, therefore, is the most comprehensive single measure of industrial activity, fell approximately 20 per cent below the level of the preceding peak year. Compared with the highly prosperous year of 1928, however, the decline in production is slightly less than 13 per cent.

Exports of manufactured goods as well as total exports declined in value approximately 25 per cent, reflecting lower prices and the marked shrinkage in purchasing power abroad which followed upon the rapidly weakening price levels and the universal contraction in industry. Also significant in this connection is the fact that our capital exports during the second half of this year have shrunk to negligible proportions.

On the basis of quantity our exports for the current year have declined about 20 per cent from last year's high levels. Imports, which fell off approximately 30 per cent in value from 1929, showed a drop in quantity of only 15 per cent. Thus our purchases and consumption of foreign goods have fallen but little below the levels of previous normal years. This great disparity between the value and quantity of our imports reflects the drastic price declines in raw materials, semi-manufactured products, and foodstuffs, which constitute approximately two-thirds of our total import volume.

While the forces of contraction were running their course the severity of the movement was happily tempered by certain ameliorative factors. Last year, immediately after the stock market crash, the President called a conference of business and labor leaders with a view of effecting the greatest possible degree of cooperation during the period of readjustment. The successful outcome of this and of later conferences is reflected in the almost total absence of industrial disputes during the present year and in the maintenance of existing wage levels. Disturbances such as characterized previous periods of depression have not arisen this year, although the contraction of purchasing power and declining price levels have resulted in the curtailment of industrial operations and the consequent discharge of many workers.

For the year as a whole factory employment was about 15 per cent below the high levels of the preceding year, but the decline in the number employed during the current year has been relatively far less than in similar preceding periods of depression. Employers have evidenced a conscious determination, so far as possible, to maintain their working forces by distributing available work thru part-time.

Building operations generally have been sharply curtailed along with the contraction of industrial activity, but the effects of this shrinkage in building have been tempered by a more than ordinary volume of construction on the part of public utilities and Federal, State and local governments. In accordance with the plans brought to fruition by the White House conferences, railroads and utilities set out on an expansion program which called for the expenditure of nearly three and a half billion dollars. At the same time public works and highway construction undertaken during the year aggregated a similar additional amount. The increase in such projects, it is estimated, has provided employment for about 200,000 additional workers who would otherwise be unemployed.

Total net capital issues during 1930 declined approximately 25 per cent as compared with the previous year. Foreign issues were confined almost entirely to the first half of the year and their later decline has closely reflected rapid price recessions and attendant economic disturbances abroad. Furthermore, the year's decline in construction, amounting to approximately 20 per cent, was an important factor in the lower level of capital issues. The initiation of an extensive public works program during the last few months has led to a marked increase in state and municipal issues during the closing months of the year.

In the financial markets the past year has been featured by a substantial decline in security prices from the relatively high levels to which they recovered last spring. Brokers' loans have been liquidated since the beginning of the year by approximately 40 per cent. The Federal Reserve member banks have diminished their indebtedness to the Reserve Banks by almost 80 per cent, as compared with 1929. Although the effect of falling security price levels and unliquid portfolios have led to bank suspensions in certain localities, the banks of the country generally are in a strong position.

Considerable encouragement is afforded by the fact that consumer buying has held up to relatively stable levels. Sales of department and other retail stores for the year have fallen only 7 to 10 per cent below the large volume of 1929. About half of this decline in dollar value is attributable to the lower price levels for retail goods, so that the quantity of goods purchased by consumers has probably been only 4 or 5 per cent less than in the preceding prosperous year.

Wholesale commodity prices, particularly prices of raw materials and agricultural products, have declined sharply during the past year and for the year as a whole averaged about 10 per cent under the 1929 level. Accompanying this decline the cost of living index has also fallen so that it is now about 6 per cent below the level of a year ago. Earlier periods of depression, such as those of 1893 and 1921, were characterized by the reaccumulation of savings which had been expended in the preceding boom period and by the wearing out of previously purchased goods, which caused a general buying movement on the part of the consuming public. That we are now approaching such a period is indicated by several significant facts. On the one hand savings deposits have been progressively accumulating while business has been maintaining a fairly even pace and has reached a total for the year almost equal to the high level of 1929 and above the total for 1928. At the same time stocks of department stores have been sharply reduced and there are some evidences of recent expansion of retail buying. While it is impossible to forecast at what time unmistakable evidences of improvement in business will occur, it is clear that we have reached a point where cessation of further declines and beginning of recovery may reasonably be expected.

In a review of business activity in 1931 which was issued a year ago, attention was called to the high level of industrial output for the year as a whole and to the fact that during the closing months activity in some lines of business was in recession. "It is impossible, of course," the statement concluded, "to forecast what temporary ups and downs may occur, but the nature of the economic development of the United States is such that one may confidently predict for the long run a continuance of prosperity and progress." Despite the sharp curtailment of economic activity during the past year no evidences have appeared which would justify a revision of this statement. There can be no doubt that the inherent strength of our economic structure will enable our country to lead the world in a vigorous recovery from the present depression as we have done in the past.

Progress in Iraq

Cargo Boat on the Tigris River.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

THE treaty between Great Britain and her most important mandated territory, the Kingdom of Iraq, which has been before the representatives of the two countries for nearly three years, has recently been definitely ratified. It recognizes Iraqi independence to take effect when Iraq becomes a member of the League of Nations.

Iraq, present-day heir of ancient Babylon in the valleys of the Tigris and Euphrates, has had an up-hill job since the World war, in its efforts to transform itself into a modern state. It has had constructive plans for physical development; but politics, religion, and the age-old social customs of some of its people have interposed stubborn obstacles in the paths of the contemplated progress.

The Iraqis have sought a status comparable to Turkey, Persia and the Hejaz, all important Arab lands under Mohammedan suzerainty, rather than that of a mandated area, or somewhat the same footing as smaller and less populous Syria and Palestine-Trans-Jordan.

Ever since the treaty of Versailles, placing the country under mandate to Great Britain, became operative in 1920, Iraq has obtained a greater and greater degree of independence. It is the only one of the twelve mandated territories which has a king, parliament, and responsible government. As a result of Iraqi insistence, the relations between mandate and nations treaty between the governments of Iraq and Great Britain which looked to the termination of the mandate when Iraq could enter the League of Nations. This treaty was later revised twice with Great Britain, under-taking more specifically to use her influence to obtain membership for Iraq in the League. If Iraq continued to make progress, still later Great Britain agreed to drop this proviso and to seek League membership for Iraq unconditionally in 1932. It is the treaty so altered that has now been ratified.

Great Britain now has both a civil and a military place in Iraqi affairs. A British high commissioner resides in Baghdad and advises the king on international and financial matters. A British air force is maintained in the country under the command of an air vice marshal. British military officers are training the Iraqi army, and a number of British governmental experts are employed in the various civil offices of the Iraqi government. These contacts will continue under the new treaty after Iraq is admitted to the League of Nations.

Restoring its Irrigation.
Embracing the potentially fertile valleys of the Tigris and Euphrates and large stretches of semi-arid and desert lands, Iraq has always been primarily an agricultural and pastoral country. In Babylonian and Greco-Roman days the valleys were herring-boned with irrigation canals and these were kept up by the Arabs in the days of the Caliphate. The lands of Iraq were exceedingly productive and its people were highly prosperous until 1258 A. D. when the Mongol invasion destroyed the irrigation embankments and headworks. Afterwards under Turkish rule Iraq became less and less prosperous, much of its once fertile valleys turned into wilderness and malaria-breeding swamps.

The aim of the most thoughtful leaders in Iraq is to restore the irrigation works which the valleys possessed during their golden age. This, however, would be a tremendous task, requiring vast amounts of capital, which Iraq is at present unable to command. The government has organized a department of irrigation and under its supervision is slowly bettering existing irrigation works and undertaking new ones. One of the most important steps has been the construction of a permanent weir in the bed of the River Dajla to replace earthen dams which were constructed annually, only to be washed away each flood season. Several river regulators and escapes were constructed in 1925, and canals were extended to revive areas that were passing out of cultivation and to bring tens of thousands of acres of new land under irrigation.

Railway System Incomplete.
In transportation agencies, other than railways, Iraq has made a marked advance in recent years. The natural outlet for the country is southeastward along its rivers to the Persian gulf. But its customers and clients are chiefly to the northwestward and the northeastward across extensive deserts and mountain ranges. These barriers have not yet been bridged by steel rails. Gaps still exist in the famous proposed "Berlin-to-Bagdad" railway so that it is not even possible to move Iraqi products as far as the eastern Mediterranean ports by rail.

There are close to a thousand miles of railway track in Iraq, but it is entirely an internal system. At no point does a railway cross the Iraqi border. The rail system, however, does perform two important functions in international trade. It carries exports and imports to and from the port of Basra, head of navigation on the Shatt-al-Arab for ocean-going ships; and it connects at Khanaqin near the Persian border with a motor road over which is carried on Iraq's sizable transit trade with Persia.

In the absence of railways to the north and west, all of the heavy freight leaving and entering Iraq must move by water through the Persian gulf. But within the last few years an excellent and rapid system has been set up for the transfer of passengers, mail and light express overland between Baghdad and Basra on the southern, and Damascus, Beyrouth, Jerusalem and Cairo on the northwest. Good, hard-surfaced highways have been constructed through long sections of the river valley.

Across the deserts that separate Iraq and Syria the ways are merely natural earth roads, but they are in fair condition, and over them powerful American-built buses carrying passengers, mail and express cover 600 miles in 24 hours. The quickest mails, however, travel by the weekly airplane service which extends from Basra to Cairo. Airplanes fly approximately over the highway route for a considerable part of the way between Baghdad and the west. At the half-way point, Rutbah, Wala, the Iraqi government has established a station which is used for refueling and rewatering by both planes and automobiles, and there a desert police force of considerable strength is maintained. At this station a restaurant is conducted, and even overnight accommodations are provided.

Of the two great rivers of Iraq, only the Tigris can be used by boats. An important freight service, moving hundreds of thousands of tons in large river steamers, is operated between Baghdad and Basra. "Special shallow draft stern-wheel river boats ply the Tigris up the river from Baghdad to Mosul; and above the latter city considerable quantities of supplies are brought downstream on rafts. Below the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates the combined tidal stream is known as the Shatt-al-Arab. The commerce on the Shatt-al-Arab has been greatly facilitated and increased since the World war by the deeper and deeper dredging by the Iraqi government of the bar at the river's mouth. Ships of 20-foot draft can now cross the bar at low water and ships of 30-foot draft at high water.

Although some progress has been made in recent years toward the development of industry and the extraction of mineral wealth from the ground, Iraq is still predominantly an agricultural and pastoral country. This condition is reflected in the exports 1927-28, the exports, including goods in transit, amounted to about $40,000,000, while the imports were valued at approximately $54,000,000. Dates, valued at close to $3,000,000, Iraq's largest export, followed by wool, $2,500,000, and cereals, $2,500,000. Among the leading articles imported were textiles, valued at approximately $3,500,000; and sugar worth $3,000,000.

The few industries carried on in Iraq are on a small scale. The residents maintain factories for spinning, knitting, carpet making, and shoe manufacture, copper smelting and flour milling. It is only a matter of time, however, until the country will have an important place among the regions producing and refining petroleum. Two financially strong companies have been organized to explore and develop the Iraqi oil supplies, and both have brought in producing wells within the past two years.

THE FORTUNES OF ANOTHER YEAR

by Wm. L. Gaston

(Resolve)

THE NEW YEAR has arrived and the most of us will soon be making the mistakes of last year over again. Of course we will point the first few days with the bright red of New Year's resolutions. But these resolutions will shape only the beginning of the year and will have small connection with the destiny to which the last days of December will lead us.

THE disappointments of the year are not apparent until the chill winds of November shake the leaves from the trees and leave facts and figures hanging stark and bare. Last year began well—all years begin well. They come tripping in fantastic colors over the snows of January, and are hailed with the hope and hilarity of youth. They come with banners and promise wealth. Rainbows always bend above the triumphal march of years.

IS these varied conditions; these contrasts of good and evil; these successes and failures that make strong men of weaklings. These are the things that make brave hearts and keen minds; these are the things that keep the masses of humanity bravely marching to meet the fortunes of the oncoming years.

NINETEEN Hundred and Thirty-one may far outstrip all other years. It may bring more of wealth and knowledge; it may be more lavish with its opportunities and deal kinder with the children of men. But, even so, the golden prizes of life ring out a challenge to the noblest traits and proudest aspirations of mankind. The coward and the slacker will fail.

EXPECTING better years will bring better years. With better years better men will continually wage a better fight for a better world. To a better world better years will hasten their coming.

New Year's Greeting from the Bens

By Florence Harris Wells

IT'S been a sort of lonesome holiday season, hasn't it, Jane? Ben Davy stopped his restless pacing to join his wife, gazing out over the fields with their deep blankets of snow. "So much snow—all week, no mail, no anything. Even if you Ben over in the old country did write, we don't know it."

"Ben didn't forget us, pa. We'll hear soon as the cars can get through. Why there's a snow plow now, and a car back of it! It's coming here, I do believe. What's that they're bringing in?" Jane hurried to the door.

"We've come to install the new radio, Mrs. Davy," the two men set down their burden. "Where do you want it?"

"We haven't ordered any radio," Ben managed to blurt out. "Must be some mistake."

"No, it's no mistake. It was ordered for Christmas, and we couldn't get it here, with the Christmas rush, blizzard and everything. But the manager said we had to get this in today; so we got the plow to clear the way. Oh, here's a letter, too," the speaker fumbled in his pocket and produced the missive.

Jane opened the letter eagerly: "It's from Ben. He's giving us the radio. And listen, pa, what he says—'Tune in on the chain program at six o'clock your time on New Year's eve, and you'll hear the same Big Ben, you heard so often when you were kids over here in London, ring in the New Year, and I'm going to be the leading violinist in the orchestra that plays right afterwards. Don't forget now—chain program at six o'clock.' Jane's eyes opened wide in alarm: "It's noon now. Will you have that radio up in time?"

The men laughed: "You bet we will, Mrs. Davy. We got our instructions straight from the boss."

At six o'clock Ben and Jane sat intent before their new radio. Big Ben was proclaiming the New Year in London. A moment of silence, then Ben slapped his knee: "It's Big Ben, Jane, Big Ben, and we haven't heard it since we were youngsters."

The chiming ceased and the orchestra burst forth: "And that's our little Ben, pa! Don't you think we hear his violin?" "Seems I do, Jane. It's a grand New Year for us."

A New Year's Reunion

By... Blanche Tanner Dillin

OLD scenes and faces returned to Lee Taylor, as he sat in his New York fourteenth floor apartment. Almost 40 years ago it was since he and James Moore, his life long friend, had quarreled over some boundary lines—just two days after the New Year's eve party, the last of Christmas week festivities.

Never had they spoken since then, and with one in New York the other in California, there was little chance of their meeting soon. Both had been wrong about the boundaries, but each was too proud to admit it.

A cherished hope of Taylor's was to have the chance to forgive and ask forgiveness.

It was comfortable here with the steam heat, the radio, and a car at his disposal—young Lee's gifts—but there was a longing for old scenes and faces.

Returning from a walk early in the evening, Mr. Taylor noticed a man turning from the door of the next apartment.

Apologetically the man asked if he knew whether the family was in. He did not, but the man's Southern accent awoke memories, and Mr. Taylor asked if he were a Southerner.

"Yes, indeed," was the quick reply; "I reckon you are, too, sir?"

"Yes sir, from Spottsylvania county, Virginia."

The other man put out his hand—he was from Spottsylvania, and had recently been there. A light broke over Lee Taylor's face. "Oh, if it could only be true—" a moment's hesitation.

"You don't happen to know a family by the name of Moore, do you?" "Why?" the man exclaimed. "That's my name—James Moore."

"Then perhaps you will be sorry you shook hands with me—for I am Lee Taylor."

The other again grasped Taylor's hand—"If you only knew how I have prayed for this hour, you wouldn't say that."

That night as the two families, including the daughter, the next door neighbor, celebrated the coming of the New Year, the two old friends with clasped hands resolved to let this be indeed a New Year with all misunderstandings buried in the past.

Begin Answer If you feel that you mispent last year, here's another brand new one you can use better.

NEW YEAR, OLD YEAR CHANGING PLACES

By MARY CAREY

"DO YOU want to take my place?" asked the Old Year.

"What's it like in the world?" asked the New Year.

"Well, it's different at different times. Sometimes it is very gay and happy, sometimes it is sad. Sometimes there are quarrels, but there is much joy, much happiness, and oh, such a lovely lot of friends one can make."

"It makes the world a wonderful place—having friends."

"Then why do you want to leave?" asked the New Year.

"Ah, I am too old now. I must go away and rest—rest with all my beautiful memories."

"Have you lovely memories?" asked the New Year.

"They are surprisingly beautiful," said the Old Year.

"Then I think I will take your place," the New Year said. "You have had much joy, you have made many friends, and now that you must go you have many beautiful memories."

And the Old Year and the New Year changed places, and every one shouted:

"Happy New Year! Happy New Year!"—Mary Graham Bonner (C) 1931, Western Newspaper Union.

APPLY New Year! The greeting was called and returned as the dozen men and girls took their places in the office.

"Empty wishes," growled Smithers cynically; "tomorrow they'll be passing the buck, blaming each other for everything gone wrong and trying to get each other's jobs."

Bill the office boy heard him as he came into his private office. Bill dropped his dust coat and answered as only an office boy would dare. "Gee, Mister Smithers, you've got 'em all wrong. They're good guys."

"Maybe you didn't know when Jimmy Pense went to the hospital how the boys took him sitting up with him nights to save him payin' for a special nurse."

"I guess you wouldn't know how Mary posted Miss Ham's books for her during the noon hour when she

"Gee, Mister Smithers, You've Got 'Em All Wrong!"

Had to go to the dentist and how Mrs. Hill took Dot out to see her sick mother at noon so she could work in the afternoon.

"Maybe you didn't know how the fellows clipped in and bought a wheel chair when the train out of old Mose's legs."

"Maybe you don't know how Mrs. Baker, the ad writer, gets up in the middle of the night and writes copy because she thinks of something good when she can't sleep. The janitor says she comes down lots of mornings before he does when the office is quiet, and I heard you hawl her out for being late from lunch yesterday."

"Maybe you don't know when that wire came last week for a big rush order while you was out of town, how they all worked overtime to help the packers get it out so the boss wouldn't blame you for being away."

"Honest, Mr. Smithers, you'd oughta know what good 'guys' they are and pat 'em on the back sometimes. You'd get a lot more out of 'em. They mean it when they wish a Happy New Year—they wish everybody was happy and they'd do all they could to make it come true. Can't nobody be happy 'less we all want good guys other folks is."

"Folks are, Bill. All right, have it your own way." Then "Happy New Year, GUYS," he called into the general office. As one man, the office force gasped and exchanged delighted smiles.

Circumstantial Evidence

By MARY CAREY

THEY had been married six months to the very day. Sally wasn't sentimental about anniversaries; she didn't expect candy or flowers; she wasn't even very much disappointed when Phil forgot the date entirely.

But to have him choose that particular evening to talk to her so dreadfully, and in front of all their friends, was really too much!

"Ye Gods!" Phil had said. "Haven't you even brains enough to return a lend? If you can't learn to play bridge, why not admit it and quit?"

Well, she had quit; she'd left not only the bridge party but Phil himself several miles behind. Sally gave a vicious push to the accelerator of her blue roadster and swung on two wheels round the corner into Park drive.

Early the next morning, Miss Georgia Sneath, starting on her daily trip to the meat market for Toodles' chopbones, passed before the closed door of an apartment on the floor below her own. Usually at this hour a burst of singing and the clatter of dishes announced to passersby that the "peppy little red-headed bride" was on the job. Today the apartment was disturbingly silent.

"Not that I'm curious," she was soon explaining to plump Mrs. Walton at the corner grocery. "You know I never pry into other people's affairs—but it did seem very queer to me, very queer indeed. I went around to the courtyard and looked up and every window was shut tight. And there was this peculiar odor. It somehow suggested a hospital to me, but it wasn't ether."

"Chloroform?"

"That's it. Yes, I'm sure that was it. Don't you remember using chloroform?"

"Yes, they do. Or sometimes people kill themselves. But you say they seemed quite happy?"

"Oh, very happy! Just bride and groom, you know. And she was such a pretty little thing, with lovely red hair. Oh, dear, what do you think I'd better do?"

"Do? Well, of course your janitor would have a pass-key, but I don't really believe... Oh my goodness, there's the trolley coming!"

Decidedly out of breath, Mrs. Walton sank into the seat nearest the trolley door and discovered its other occupant to be a friend of her younger sister's. They fell into casual conversation, to which the older woman, after a time, contributed the story she had just heard.

"The Waverly Court Apartment," Lorna exclaimed. "Yes—I know where they are. I'll be looking for details in the paper. So long."

Philip Armstrong looked up from his desk, annoyed by the chatter of the filing clerks inside the next partition. He half rose from his chair to ask for quiet, overheard some one say "The Waverly Court Apartments" and sank back to listen.

"Go on, Lorna. It's like hearing a newspaper story before it comes out."

"Only I don't know the end. Anyway this young couple had been living there for about six months, and they seemed crazy about each other, she said—which doesn't sound like suicide. But all the doors and windows were shut tight and stuffed round the edges with rags, and burglars wouldn't do that. Then there was this terrible smell of chloroform, simply overpowering, and no answer to all their pounding on the door."

"My heavens, girl, what all Mr. Armstrong! He's been acting queer all morning and now he's dashed off without his coat or hat."

At almost the same moment, in a downtown tea room, a plump matron suddenly exclaimed to her besom friend: "My dear, do look at that girl. Tearing out as though the place was on fire."

"She was listening to you," remarked the even plumper friend, placidly sipping a frosted chocolate. "and when she said 'Waverly Court Apartments' she just jumped out of her chair."

So it happened that Philip Armstrong and his very new and very red-headed wife fell into each other's arms at the door of a certain much-talked-of apartment.

"Oh! darling darling—I was a brute!"

"Dearest—I was a perfect little fool. I drove out to Mother's for the night, of course."

Suddenly they realized that the door of their apartment stood open and that from within there came forth a faint but decidedly anesthetic odor and the sound of voices. In the kitchen they found Miss Sneath and the janitor, sniffing at a large wooden crate.

"What's in it?" demanded Miss Sneath.

"Dangerous!" chorused the Armstrongs.

"They're spoiling on the bottom, mum," announced the janitor, after another sniff. "And I'm not saying they don't smell mighty like this here chloroform Miss Georgia was a huntin' for."

"I suppose I should apologize," began Miss Sneath, hesitatingly. "Oh, please don't," cried Sally. "Indeed we're most grateful to you," added Phil. "Won't you please have some oranges?"

Doris Jay, in a Dust Cap

By JANE OSBORN

AT GRAYSON'S typists came and typists went but impeccable Miss Hanson went on forever. Just at present Doris Jay was the typist who had most recently arrived and who, it seemed to Miss Hanson, ought to be the next to leave.

"A nice, neat, pleasant sort of girl," Miss Hanson was telling Mr. Michael Grayson in a condescending sort of way—condescending not, of course, toward Mr. Grayson but toward the girl in question. "But she simply won't do. She isn't the type—she doesn't belong—and besides she can't manage her typewriter."

"Oh, well, all right," snapped Michael Grayson, who sometimes wearied of the efficient methods of his stenographer who was ten years his senior and had a way of treating him like a nephew.

Obviously Miss Hanson had some special prejudice against Miss Jay. But they decided not to tell her of her fate until pay day. Then they would give her a week's salary and tell her not to come back. That was the system at Grayson's.

Neither he nor Miss Hanson saw her that evening go down the hall to the stockroom where she sought and found Larry, the shipping clerk and office opener. "You know you promised me a key to the office," she whispered to him. "Don't say anything to anyone, Larry. It's all right. You know you promised—" and with a little coaxing Miss Doris Jay was going her way the cheerful possessor of the key.

Then as Miss Hanson went out she stopped to see Larry. She asked him about a girl he knew who might want a job. "We're letting Miss Jay go tomorrow."

"Miss Jay," exclaimed Larry. "I don't believe she knows it—well, of course, I haven't anything to say about it."

"Of course, you haven't, Larry," agreed Miss Hanson acridly. "This Miss Jay isn't the sort of girl we usually employ here. I hope you understand."

Larry didn't understand in the least. Miss Jay was neat, trim and good to look upon but not in the least what Larry would call "flashy." Perhaps her work hadn't been up to the mark but she had only been there two weeks. Larry went home and continued to worry about the key until seven that night. Then he boldly called up Mr. Michael Grayson at his home and told his employer, of the key.

Michael Grayson said that there could be no harm in giving the key to the girl, who doubtless had some work she wanted to do before opening hour in the morning. Then he got to thinking about it. Miss Hanson had said that the girl "didn't belong." Michael hadn't had the most remote idea of what she meant by that, but perhaps she really had some suspicious of the girl.

Michael let himself into the outer office. "Hello," he called out, "anyone around?" Then there in his own office with the door open between it and the outer office—he saw Doris. It was Doris Jay surely—but Doris in a dust cap. She wore an enormous apron hanging lower than her trim little frock, and when he first saw her there she was on her knees applying what appeared to be furniture oil to the end of his desk.

"Oh, I never thought you'd come," she cried. "I was just trying to clean things up here a little. I heard you say that it annoyed you because the cleaning woman never really cleaned your office, and it drives me most crazy—the dust and everything. So I just made up my mind to come back. I brought some soap and some cloths and some furniture polish and I found an old pail in here—and, well, I'm getting things so they look a little better."

Michael was standing there smiling with boundless pleasure and admiration.

Doris went on: "Maybe I'm a poor typist—Miss Hanson told me I was of no use in an office—but I just made up my mind that I'd try to do a little to earn my salary. And I knew you said the dust annoyed you, too."

Michael begged her to stop, assuring her that he didn't want her to do such hard work and that he was afraid she would mar her nice hands. But Doris refused to quit.

"Till stick around here then," he said, "until you are through. And then I want to take you some place nice to have something to eat. I ran off without half finishing my dinner, and I'll bet you did, too."

The next day he gave Miss Hanson orders—quite drastic orders, too—to do nothing about discharging Miss Jay. Miss Hanson sulked and did as she was told. A week later he told her to take Miss Jay's name off the payroll.

"I thought you'd come to your senses," smirked the able stenographer. "I knew you'd want her to leave."

"I certainly do," said Michael. "But not for the reason you think. I'm going to marry Doris Jay and I'd rather not have the girl I'm engaged to working in my office."

Nancy's New Year

by MYRTLE KOON CHERRYMAN

WISH I knew what New Year's looks like," sighed Nancy.

She was a bright little girl, and knew many things, but was always wanting to know more, and, having a lively imagination, she liked to make pictures of everything.

She had seen many pictures of Santa Claus, but she had a different one in her own mind, all sparkling and jingly, with Santa in it, but lots of other things, too. Now, when she said this about New Year's, her small brother, Douglas, shook his head, for he didn't know whether New Year's was a city or an automobile, or just what it was.

Big sister Barbara, who was a great tease, said, "New Year's looks like a hippopotamus with a monkey on its back." Father tried to explain about the calendar, and the maid, Thelma, remembering the household on the first of January last year, said that New Year's looked like sleepy-heads who were cross from eating too much. Even mother didn't have much help to offer, as she was busy getting ready for a party; and when Nancy appealed to Clarence, the man who did things around the place, he just grinned and said, "You'll find out when the time comes."

Her chum, Patricia, who was usually good at explaining things, was so preoccupied with her new ping-pong set, that she only said, "Silly!" and went on playing. So Nancy went to sleep that New Year's eve, still wondering.

When she woke in the morning, her mother called, "Oh, Nancy, get up and look out of the side window!" And when she ran, in her new Christmas pajamas to do so, she saw Clarence standing beside a beautiful little white pony and holding up a big card on which was printed, "Happy New Year, to Nancy."

"Oh, goody!" shouted Nancy. "I know what New Year's is now—it's a pony—just what I've always wanted!"

And so, though the pony had been named "Dolly," it was always called "Happy New Year," after that.

ON THE THRESHOLD

By A. H. BALDWIN, in Detroit News.

RING out, O bells! Ring silver sweet o'er hill and moor and fell! In mellow echoes let your chiming their joyful story tell.

Ring out, ring out, all-jubilant, the joyous, glad refrain: "A bright New Year, a glad New Year, hark come to us again!"

Ah! Who can say how much of joy within it there may be! Stored up for us who listen now to your sweet melody! Good-by Old Year! Trifled, trusty friend, thy tale at last is told. O New Year! Write thou thine for us in lines of brightest gold.

"Great guns!" exclaimed the doctor. "Fever, too! I can't understand your heart action. Yes, you'd better stay here a few days longer." With instructions for the nurse, he left.

Miss Bowen turned back to her patient. "Doctor says I'm to keep a close watch over you and see that you don't get excited."

He laughed. "I'm all right—now they tell me I don't have to go home."

"You are lonely?"

"Yes," he answered, "and in love, too."

"Oh," Miss Bowen looked away. "But I didn't find it out till just now," he continued. "I wouldn't mind going home if I could take my nurse with me."

With starry eyes she turned to him. "There isn't any reason why you shouldn't go home. You're well enough."

At the receiving desk they paused. "Tell Doctor Scott," he said, "to get a new nurse, and say, tell him I never felt better in my life, and am going home for New Year's."

LOCAL DEATHS OF THE NEW YEAR

GEE
Samuel Denman Goe, son of Harmon and Elizabeth (Flint) Goe, was born June 3, 1857, two miles east of St. Joe, on the Gee homestead, the place now occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Curie, and died in Sacred Heart Hospital, Garrett, Indiana, January 1, 1931, at the age of 73 years, 6 months and 29 days.

Mr. Goe was united in marriage with Flora L. Fuller, daughter of Nathan L. and Lucinda (Nicholls) Fuller, June 6, 1886. To this union three children were born—Foster N. of St. Joe; Howard H. of Fort Wayne, and K. Lucille, wife of Milo J. Provines of Butler, Indiana. The widow, the three children and twelve grandchildren constitute the family of the deceased.

Two brothers and one sister are still living: William C., of Ashland, Ohio; Laney, of St. Joe, and Nina, Mrs. I. S. Hadsell, of Hicksville. Two aged uncles, Mr. L. G. Flint of Vincennes, Ind., and Mr. Amherst Robe of Gallien, Mich., also survive. Two brothers and two sisters are numbered with the dead: Christopher H., Alvaro J., Ophelia and Sherman. A large circle of relatives and friends share the deep grief which has fallen upon the immediate family in the death of a most worthy husband and father.

Mr. Goe grew to manhood on the farm where he was born, attended the local church and school, where he always had numerous friends. He was strong and ambitious and skilled in the work that came to the lot of the young men of his time. A few years after marriage—November, 1899—he moved to St. Joe, where he was in the employ of the Filley Sawmill Company for several years. On January 2, 1901, he was employed by the Wabash Railway Company in the department of bridge construction and carpentry, which position he held continuously until retirement, November 16, 1929.

In the winter of 1885, under the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Jewell, the deceased became obedient to the Christian faith, uniting with the Church of Christ at Coburn's Corners. This act was in perfect keeping with the family and community life in which he was nurtured.

Upon moving to St. Joe, he transferred his membership to the Church of Christ in that village. Mr. Goe was also a charter member of the Knights of Pythias Lodge No. 400, of St. Joe.

Mr. Goe was a splendid husband and father. In the home he was always brave and kind, contributing a full measure of manly devotion to his wife and children. In the community his sympathies were always with the right, and his conduct continuously good and Christian. He lived well. His memory will bless his people and friends.

The funeral was held from the St. Joe Church of Christ on Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock, with the Rev. J. N. Scholes officiating. Burial in St. Joe cemetery.

Those attending the funeral from out-of-town were: Harry Fuller, son and wife of Garrett; Logan Fuller, Flint, Mich.; Mrs. Francine Nelson, son Read, and family of Antwerp, Ohio; Mrs. Carrie Musser and son, Ward of Bryan, O.; Mr. and Mrs. Bert Nicholls of Farmer Center; Mr. and Mrs. I. S. Hadsell, Calvin Coburn, Mrs. C. W. Jackson, Charles Thayer and Mrs. George Krontz, two sons and daughter of Hicksville and Mr. and Mrs. Glen Abel of Peru.

Members of the Wabash Bridge Carpenter Crew were: Lon Willman, Alva Dills, Philip Murphy, Morgan Rose and Vernon Wilmoth, and they were accompanied by their wives.

CARD OF THANKS

We desire to thank the neighbors and friends for their expressions of sympathy, the beautiful floral offerings, the male quartette for the music, Rev. Scholes for the sermon and all who in any way assisted us in our time of need in the loss of our dear husband and father.

Mrs. S. D. Goe,
Foster N. Goe,
Howard H. Goe,
K. Lucille Goe-Provines.

JACKSON

Charles Louis Jackson, son of Andrew and Minerva Jackson, was born August 2, 1864, in Concord Township, DeKalb County, Ind. He passed from this life January 3, 1931 at the age of 66 years, 6 months and 1 day. His entire life was spent in this vicinity.

He was united in marriage to Valeria Timmerman in the year 1884. To this union was born two children: Mabel, who resides at home and Ford, who resides on the farm home.

He united with the church under the pastorate of Rev. Langley. He worked faithfully in the present Concord Church, serving in the capacities of teacher and superintendent for a number of years. He was a kind and affectionate man, always helping neighbors in time of need.

He was in the service of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad for 33 years, being compelled to retire on account of poor health. His last days were spent in great suffering but through it all, he bore it bravely.

He leaves to mourn his departure, the widow, one son, Ford, one daughter, Mabel, and one granddaughter, Ires; two brothers, Bert Jackson of St. Joe and Hollis Jackson of near St. Joe; also many friends.

The funeral was held at the Concord Church Monday afternoon at 2 o'clock with Rev. B. W. Mayfield officiating. Burial in Riverside Cemetery. E. R. Kinsey had charge of the burial.

SHEFFER

Barton S. Sheffer, son of Adam and Rachel Sheffer, was born in Morrow County, Ohio, June 8, 1847, and died in St. Joe, Indiana, January 5, 1931, aged 82 years, 6 months and 27 days. He was one of six children, none of whom is now living.

He was united in marriage with Eva S. Hadsell, at Waterloo, Indiana, March 16, 1876. To this union were born three children: Lina S., deceased, Ray H., deceased, and Craig, of St. Joe, Indiana. There are also three grandchildren.

Mr. Sheffer's special training was in medicine. He began, as then was the custom, by reading under a practicing physician, and later entered Western University, from which institution he graduated with the class of 1877.

After graduation he began the practice of medicine in Antwerp, Ohio, then at Kendallville, Indiana, and, about the year 1884 he came to St. Joe, where the major part of his life work was done. In all of these places the Doctor's professional ability was recognized, and he always ranked well among his fellow doctors in the county and state.

In church relation Dr. Sheffer first affiliated with the Baptists. His first public profession of faith was made under the ministry of the Rev. Dr. Earl of London, England, who was then conducting services in Cleveland, Ohio, where the Doctor was a university student. He united with the Church of Christ in Kendallville, Indiana, and after locating in St. Joe became a charter member of the Church of Christ, contributing generously of his time, talent and means to the establishment of the Disciples' cause in that village. During active life Dr. Sheffer's Christian influence extended all over DeKalb County. He has been officially connected with the local church since its founding. He was also a charter member of the Knights of Pythias Lodge, No. 400.

The Doctor was a fine community spirit. He was always interested in good things being done. He was very democratic in spirit, touching a wide range of life helpfully. His life has been a rich contribution to St. Joe. He waited long at the threshold that we might the better evaluate his life. The funeral services were conducted from the St. Joe Church of Christ on Wednesday afternoon with Rev. J. N. Scholes officiating. Burial in Alton Cemetery east of St. Joe, E. R. Kinsey in charge.

COUNTRY HOME NEARLY DESTROYED BY FIRE

The country home of W. W. Wilder and wife of Newville township, located just south of Coleton school house, was badly damaged by fire Saturday morning.

As the Wilders were eating their breakfast, Mr. Wilder looked out and saw sparks falling to the ground. He said nothing but went out to see and the entire roof was on fire.

A call was sounded hurriedly by the telephone to the neighbors and in no time many were there fighting the blaze.

The fire department was called from St. Joe and when they arrived they used one tank of chemicals and outened the blaze where it was difficult to get at with the water.

There was no wind Saturday morning, which made it easier to control the blaze.

The household goods were pretty well removed from the house. The damage is covered by insurance in the Farmer's Mutual.

A note from the Wilder family follows:

We wish to express our sincere thanks to our neighbors and friends for their splendid help in extinguishing the fire that was destroying our home.

W. W. Wilder and Family.

K. OF P. RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT

Whereas it has pleased the Almighty God to remove from our midst and call to his eternal reward, Brother S. D. Goe, Therefore, Be it resolved, That in the death of Brother Goe, the K. of P. Lodge, No. 400 has lost a valued member, this community a good citizen and the wife a devoted husband.

Therefore, Be it Resolved, that we be urged to a more faithful discharge of our duties in exemplification of his virtues.

Be it Further Resolved, as a mark of respect and esteem to our deceased brother, that our charter be draped for a period of thirty days, that these resolutions be spread on record in the minutes of our Lodge, that a copy be sent to the St. Joe News for publication and a copy sent to the bereaved family, to whom we extend our heartfelt sympathy.

A NEW YEAR'S WEDDING

New Year's Day, a day of new beginnings, new hopes, new determination, new aspirations, seemed to be most appropriately chosen as the day when Paul Fetters, 23, son of Mr. and Mrs. Jay Fetters, south of Concord, and Miss Ellen White, 21, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Irvin White, of west of St. Joe, were united in marriage at the Methodist Parsonage by Rev. B. W. Mayfield.

The young couple is well known and highly respected in this community, and they will start house keeping on the Jenkins farm north of town.

The News extends congratulations.

Farm Kitchen Needs Plenty of Light

Farm Kitchen With Well Lighted Work Centers in Good Sequence.

Limited wall and floor space have been used to good advantage in the farm kitchen shown in the accompanying photograph. This picture was taken by the United States Department of Agriculture, after the farm home-maker had introduced certain changes suggested by the home demonstration agent. Extension workers in many states have made a special point of encouraging the home-maker to scrutinize her kitchen arrangement and equipment and see if she cannot place the major pieces so that her work is routed naturally. Notice the long contour under the supply shelves, where work can be done within easy access to the sink and running water; similarly, the short distance from the sink, where pans must be filled with water for cooking, to the range; the double drain boards; the two windows; the electric light over the sink, but slightly to one side of it, so the worker does not cast her own shadow over the dish washing; the high stool; the linoleum covered floor. Storage closets under the work counter take care of utensils and supplies that are not constantly needed. The equipment in this kitchen is not expensive, but it is very conveniently arranged.

Some Good Things for the Table

By NELLIE MAXWELL

... Night on the hills!
And the ancient stars emerge,
The silence of their mighty distances
Compels the world to peace. Now
Of life to a soft stir of mountain rills.
And over the swam and urge
Of eager men, sleep falls and darkling ease.
—Walt Whitman.

Bananas make delightful salads, fruit cocktails, desserts, ices and may be served as a vegetable. Bananas should be thoroughly ripe if used fresh. Those a bit green will cook nicely and be wholesome.

Baked Bananas.—Strip the skin from the firm yellow fruit, scrape the banana to remove the strings which give an acid flavor to the fruit. Cut into halves lengthwise, place in a buttered dish and sprinkle with sugar. Pour over six tablespoonsful of water and bake in a moderate oven until translucent. For six bananas, use six teaspoonsful of sugar (brown is best), with a pinch of salt.

Bananas Baked in Lemon Juice.—Cut four large bananas into halves lengthwise and put into a baking dish. Peel two large oranges and divide into sections. Add the sections to the top of the bananas. Sift one-half cupful of sugar over the oranges and add one-half cupful of lemon juice with any of the juice left from the oranges. Bake 20 minutes. Serve hot or cold.

Is very nice served with cold meats. Banana Fritters.—Remove the skins from eight bananas and cut into halves lengthwise, then into quarters. Sprinkle with powdered sugar, one-half tablespoonful of lemon juice and one-half tablespoonful of grated orange rind. Cover and let stand half an hour. Then dip into the following batter and fry in deep fat. Drain on brown paper. Sprinkle with powdered sugar and serve.

Bananas Fried in Butter.—Make a fine garnish for broiled steak. Served with cooked chops they are especially good. Fruit Cocktail.—Take three oranges, three grapefruits, one cupful of grapes, three tablespoonsful of lemon juice, six tablespoonsful of powdered sugar and one bottle of maraschino cherries. Remove the sections of the oranges and grapefruit. Combine the ingredients and serve very cold. Pineapple may be substituted for the grapes. Creamed Shrimps and Mushrooms.—Melt three tablespoonsful of butter, add one-half cupful of mushrooms, chopped, stir and cook two minutes, add four tablespoonsful of flour and when mixed, one cupful of stock or thin cream; now add one cupful of chopped cooked shrimps, salt, paprika and pepper to taste. A soft cooked egg dropped into a patty shell and covered with the shrimp mixture makes a very dainty luncheon dish. Winter Sherbet.—Take one-fourth cupful of orange juice, one-half cupful of lemon juice, two and one-half cupsful of sugar, one quart of milk and one cupful of sweetened cranberry sauce. Mix and freeze. Cider may be substituted for the cranberry if desired.

If one is serving a yellow luncheon and wishes the soup to be tinted, add two or three dark yellow egg yolks well beaten just before serving. They not only give the note of color but add to the nourishment. (©, 1931 Western Newspaper Union.)

Winsome Combination for Tea Sandwich

Cut nut bread in one-fourth inch slices. Spread lightly with butter. Mash cream cheese with a fork; season with salt and paprika and thin out slightly with pineapple juice. Spread one slice of bread with cheese and then with a generous layer of crushed pineapple, well drained. Cover with second slice and press lightly together. Cut diagonally. These sandwiches are popular for afternoon tea.

Evening Story for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

As Santa Claus looked through his wonderful telescope on Christmas morning he said:

"It is always a great help to me, too, to see the children. I can tell in this way, too, what pleases them most."

"Of course I have their letters and I try to give all of them the presents they most want."

"But in this way I can tell how much they like the toys and games and books I have given to them."

"It gives me so many ideas, too. There," he continued, as he talked to his dog, Boy of the North, "it is just as I thought."

"Little girls will never grow tired of dolls and boys will always like trains."

"And they enjoy a good game, too, for the winter evenings. Ah, I see that boy at his skates."

"He asked for a pair in his letter to me—that is he asked for a pair in the six different letters he wrote to me."

"He really can hardly wait to start using them. I do believe he would like it if the floor were suddenly covered with ice!"

"And how that little girl is hugging her doll! I thought the one I made with the golden curls and the eyes that opened and shut would just about suit her."

"She told me the kind she wanted in her letter. What a help those letters are! They tell me what they want, and they tell me so many nice things, too."

"They tell me how much they are looking forward to my visit, and that they hope I'll have a merry Christmas, too."

"The dear little people! As if I could help but have a merry Christmas when I look through this telescope and see their smiles."

"How happy they do look! How their eyes sparkle."

"And their letters tell me that they've tried to be good. I know they have! And they tell me of things their little brothers and sisters want."

"I like that—I like hearing of them thinking of each other. Oh, such a great help as the letters are, but my much better now. And how she does love the white lamb with the blue ribbon around its neck which I took to her."

"Oh, she does love him so much. I certainly couldn't have forgotten that lamb."

"She's going to love him as long as she is a little girl. I'm sure of that!"

And Santa looked through his magic telescope and saw the children opening their gifts, and their excitement and their glee and their happiness made Santa Claus happy beyond all words.

Ways of Combining Winter Vegetables

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Before the spring vegetables are all available, one must still depend on carrots, onions, celery, and other winter vegetables several times a week. Here are two ways of combining some of these to give a little variety in the menu. Both recipes are from the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture. Either dish is substantial enough for a main course at luncheon.

Vegetable Curry.

1 cup rice 4 tbs. butter or oil
1 cup diced onion 1/2 cup salt
1 cup diced carrots 1/4 cup curry
1 cup diced celery 1/4 cup curry
1 cup fresh or 1 cup worcestershipped peas shire sauce

Wash the rice and cook in two quarts of boiling salted water. Drain in a colander, pour cold water through, and let stand over steam until the grains swell and become separate. Cook the vegetables in a small quantity of water and just before removing from the stove add the canned peas, or if fresh peas are available, cook them with the other vegetables. Use the liquid from the vegetables and add the fat, salt, curry, and sauce. On a hot platter make a ring of the cooked rice, pile the vegetables in the center, pour over them the liquid mixture, and serve very hot.

Five-Minute Cabbage Retains Vitamins

Five-minute cabbage gives one, in a hot cooked vegetable, the crisp texture of cabbage that has been made into slaw. As it is cooked only enough to heat thoroughly, this helps to retain vitamins that make cabbage an important item, especially in the winter menu. The recipe is from the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture.

2 cups milk 1 tbs. melted but-
1/2 cup shredded ter or other fat cabbage 1 tbs. flour
1 cup cream or rich Salt milk Pepper

Heat the milk and cook the cabbage in it for two minutes. Add the cup of cream or rich milk, the blended fat and flour and the seasoning; cook rapidly for three or four minutes and stir constantly. The cabbage retains its crispness and is delicate in flavor and color.

As a Man Sees It
Back-talk is a woman's back-bone.—
Colliers Weekly.

Vegetable Loaf.

1 tbs. melted butter 1/2 cup chopped or other fat nuts
2 cups soft bread 4 tbs. liquid from crumbs cooked vege-
1 cup chopped tables cooked celery 2 eggs, beaten 1 cup diced cooked 1 tbs. salt carrots 1 cup milk
1 cup cooked or canned peas or

Mix the fat with the bread crumbs, and reserve about one-fourth cupful for the outside of the loaf. Mix together all the ingredients, form into a loaf on a sheet of greased paper, cover the surface with the crumbs, place on a rack in an uncovered pan, and bake in a moderate oven for 30 minutes. The loaf should then be hot through and the crumbs golden brown. Serve with tomato sauce.

First Sewing Machine
While Elias Howe is usually credited with the invention of the sewing machine, a patent for this device was secured 15 years earlier, in 1830, by a Frenchman, Bartholomew Thimonnier, who was called the "enemy of thimbles" by Parisian garment makers.

Fur Coat May Be Any Length

new types of peltry to add to the list with each passing season, nor are any omitted from the present style program. The variety of furs represented in the current modes is amazing.

The latitude offered in choices of peltry tells only part of the story, for fur coats, as they are this winter, were never so cunningly and diversely styled. It seems that the new models are "willing to go to any length" to achieve the chic silhouette. The range includes everything from the jaunty little bolero to short hip-length jackets to the finger-tip length (see model to the left in the picture), and on and on to three-quarter to seven-eighths, with special emphasis being given to the popular and stunning full-length coat types.

From the styles illustrated one senses the charming contrast which goes to make up this season's fur coat program. These elegant furs were the selection of Genevieve Tobin, which is "huff" said, for these Hollywood stars sure do know style. The finger-tip jacket of burunduk is slightly bloused at the back. The collar is effective worn up around the neck or thrown open. In Paris the jacket of striped fur worn with a black velvet skirt is a much featured fashion among the displays.

The beige ermine coat to the right is a very exquisite affair. It preserves the slender lines which are the envy of every woman, and it carries an air of quiet elegance.

It does not matter what type of fur is used for the coat, whether inexpensive or of fabulous value, it is sure to be styled with fetching details and to interpret a silhouette of distinction, for that is the way of all the this season's models—they are smart to the nth degree.

Bread Clubs Are Liked by the Girls

The various food preparation and meal planning projects that are carried on among 4-H club girls usually include a unit on making breads of all kinds—both yeast-raised breads and quick breads, such as biscuits, muffins, and griddle cakes. These bread clubs are very much liked by the girls, because it often happens that the first help the growing girl is called on to give in her home is to make biscuits or muffins so as to relieve her mother

New Hampshire 4-H club girl, starting to make some biscuits. Hazel has done the cooking for the entire family for the past three or four years, for her mother is an invalid. She has found the knowledge gained in club work of considerable help to her.

The standard recipe for biscuits which many 4-H girls use is in Farmers' Bulletin 1450-F, Home Baking, which is free to anyone writing to the United States Department of Agriculture, but in case some reader wants to use it at once, it is given here:

Baking Powder Biscuits.
1 cup milk 4 tbs. baking pow-
8 cups sifted soft der wheat flour 1 tbs. salt
4 to 6 tbs. fat

Either milk or water may be used as the liquid in baking powder biscuits and the quantity varied to obtain the kind of biscuits desired. Some persons prefer the texture of a biscuit made from very stiff dough, using as little as possible. Others like a lighter biscuit, for which the dough is made very soft by using more liquid and combining very lightly. Drop biscuits which are not rolled out may be made by adding more liquid than for a soft dough.

All dry ingredients are mixed and sifted together. The fat is worked in, and the liquid is added to this fat and flour mixture. Cutting the fat into the flour with knives, a pastry fork or a biscuit cutter is often recommended to avoid warming or handling it too much, but the tips of the fingers may be used if the work is done quickly.

Sour milk may be substituted for sweet if a scant half teaspoonful of soda is used to neutralize one cupful of sour milk. Two teaspoonsful of baking powder are then omitted, but the other two teaspoonsful of baking powder are used.

of this task. As she gradually gains skill she is entrusted with more ambitious baking—yeast bread and cakes, and sometimes becomes so proficient that she can make a little extra money herself from the sale of her baked products. At one time or another most bread-club girls participate in demonstrations at county and state fairs, and often win substantial prizes by their exhibits.

WHERE many of the season's smartest fur coats are gathered together—what a gorgeous spectacle! In their presence the very atmosphere seems to be charged with a spirit of luxury. And how intriguingly are they styled—the fur coats which are at this moment glorifying the midwinter style pageant.

It seems that fashion is discovering

THE STORY

Returning to London, practically penniless, after an unsuccessful business trip, Sir George Sandison takes dinner with his widowed stepmother, his old nurse, Aggy. He did not approve of her marriage to his father, but her explanation satisfies him. Little is left of the estate, and Lady Sandison proposes that they go to the United States to visit her brother, Robert Macbeth, wealthy contractor, Sir George agrees. Macbeth lives on an island estate with his daughter, Roberta, who longs for city life.

He heard then, although it was one of the most beautiful spots in a justly famous county, that it was in Roberta's opinion a "dead end." Her opinion of her father's financial shrewdness and ability seemed to have suffered of his money in the island.

He looked about him. His island was a mile long and from a quarter to half a mile wide. It held all a man might want, a long stretch of garden, a farm and woodland, a beach and fishing rights. It rose to a considerable height above the water level, levelly green and fair, with the remodeled old Pennsylvania farmhouse standing on the southwestern end. There was a long terrace sweep down to a little beach where his boats were moored and a tiny suspension bridge connected with the mainland.

He had first seen this island some years ago, and had longed to share it with Roberta, then, but there were difficulties in the way of acquiring it, and he had decided if he could buy it, it would be a delightful surprise to bring her there when she left school. This was his reward!

With a tremendous effort, Robert Macbeth had controlled his temper. He had kept back the profane words that rose to his lips, and said decidedly: "I didn't know you smoked at that rate and I don't like it. Clear out now and let me think. I'll tell you this much, I have wanted this island for a long time and now that I've got it, I'm going to keep it."

"You won't keep me here long," Roberta declared—surprised and angry. "I give you fair warning that I can't stand the place and I don't intend to. It bores me."

"Does it so?" her father said, without looking at her. "Then, my dear, you'll get from between me and my view of the Delaware. I'm an ill man and I need the air and a little peace."

Then he had done the most effective thing he could do though it will never be known whether he did it by design or accident. He leaned back in his chair and closed his eyes.

"Well, I'm off where the company's more congenial," Roberta announced and abruptly she had left him, although that meant leaving undisturbed and unsettled all those domestic problems about which she had come to consult with him.

Life, Roberta felt at that moment, was an extremely turbulent and difficult thing at eighteen plus, despite the fact that one's elders and the poets constantly acclaim it the only perfect time, the springtime of youth. There was so much to be met for the first time, however sophisticated one might strive to appear. Other people, especially older people, were so difficult to understand, and failed so signally to understand one. They insisted on begin reckoned with, on thrusting their standards and wishes upon youth, instead of stepping gracefully and quietly into the background and acting as Greek chorus only when needed.

As soon as Roberta had taken her departure the immediate domestic problems, two robust black women, without consulting the owner of the island, left also and in the station car with the coffee-colored chauffeur. They graced a great deal, when the island and Mr. Macbeth were a safe distance behind them.

"At high-flyin' Miss Roberta's gonna git quite some surprise, quite some," the cook told the waitress. "Even 'at baby comes back, and see no one round 'ceptin' the ol' man, settin' reposition in his chair, what she sayin' 'em?"

They laughed gaily. "Ma week's up today, and I hears her tellin' 'e ol' man she getting rid of 'as for some white pussies today or tomorrow. I makes it today," the waitress added.

"Ahm leavin' this beach station cab at 'e station," the chauffeur assured them. "At red-headed baby used terms to me this mornin'. Terms!"

They laughed all the way to the next roadside refreshment stand, where they all alighted to fortify themselves with sausages and rolls and ice cream in cones.

While they ate, Roberta slackened the speed of her car, and knowing nothing of their departure, looked back from the highway at her father's island. What a place! Lovely enough, she had to admit, lying low and green, high above the river, its tree tops showing a little below the road that, well above both canal and river, ran along the foot of a rocky slope that walled it in on the land side.

It was a charming road, and everywhere Roberta stopped to look it seemed to grow more beautiful. At one side of the road rhododendrons, laurel and tall trees climbed high above on the rocky slope. On the other side, the white painted posts marking the highway protected one from a sheer drop of thirty or forty feet to the canal. Between the canal and river was a broad flat space, green and sunny, and then the Delaware, rushing swiftly along, broad and shallow.

Where the island stood in its way, the river separated into two smaller, deeper and more turbulent streams. On the island, gleaming white and gray against the green and blue, was the lovely old house her father had remodeled, and without doubt, thought Roberta angrily, paid a great deal too much for.

If she had only been able to stop him and divert the golden stream, it might have paid for an apartment in New York, on Park Avenue, with a summer place at Bar Harbor or even Watch Hill, where she knew some of the younger crowd. That represented Roberta's idea of a fit and worthy establishment and background for herself, if her father persisted in staying in these United States.

All her school dreams of Monte Carlo, the Riviera, the Lido, floated through her careless little red head. Why had father been so stupid as to select this place? Ye gods! Nothing but a lot of artists and writers, who did not apparently know or care what life looked like outside their hedger. What was the use of having money if that was the way her father meant to spend it, and to tie her down?

Her car swerved and she heard a sharp cry in an agitated foreign voice. She pulled at her emergency brake, for the road was narrow here. It looked for a moment as though she could not avoid a collision between her car and the heavy limousine that Joe Ligor, the station hackman, was driving. Before she shut off her engine, Roberta, quick, calm and cool, as her father's daughter would be in a crisis, swerved her car a little toward the land side of the road. The impact when it came was slight. She saw one of Joe's fenders crumple, and she heard a gasp of relief from the excitable Joe as he called:

"Hey, Mees Macbeth! Why you not looka where you going, eh? You want keel me with these people I beengra to your house, eh? You breaka my car in two at the samea-time!"

"Sorry, Joe," Roberta called, in the honeyed voice that made men forgive her anything. She lit a cigarette with trembling fingers. "Send the bill to father if I've hurt your old machine any, and for Heaven's sake look where you're going next time."

"Joe looked! That a godda joke," Joe said, laughing.

On the rear seat of Joe's car Roberta saw a dumpy little woman and a tall man. She could not see the man's face plainly because the woman was leaning forward and looking at her intently. There was something odd, familiar, about this woman's face, and yet Roberta did not know her. The woman's face, and the quaint British look of the traveling bag she clutched, made Roberta instantly revert to the beginning of her quarrel with her father, this morning—the servant question.

"Oh," she exclaimed, "The new cookhousekeeper and the butler! I cookhousekeeper you tomorrow. Well, I can't go back just now. Take them to the island, Joe. My father's at home."

She smiled implicitly, as she thought of her father's annoyance when actually confronted with the domestic problems he had so lightly disregarded this morning.

The woman, Roberta had seen, put a hand out quickly and touched the sleeve of the man beside her to prevent his speaking.

"Aye," she said, "that will be best. On your way, my man."

There was something so authoritative in that voice that Joe stopped smiling at Miss Macbeth, whom he admired inordinately, and started his car.

Roberta shot another quick glance at them. The next moment, blank amazement on her face, she had turned about and was gazing after the rapidly disappearing car.

Well! Handsome as is handsome does, she told herself, but think of having this for a butler! "I wonder if the heavy dame is his mother or his wife."

She looked back again and hesitated, but Joe's car was well on its way toward the island.

Scottie both! Roberta thought bitterly. Just my luck! Now dad will fraternize with them, and I'll be lucky if she can cook anything but oatmeal.

Disgusted, she increased speed. She must hurry if she was to meet the young man from Philadelphia, whose coming was the immediate cause of Roberta's discontent, and though she did not know it, her father's towering rage.

Lady Sandison turned and regarded her stepson. Damsels, and Lady Sandison had been pleased to note, had fallen down and worshipped his beauty to an extent that must gratify the most exacting of stepmothers, yet he remained unmoved. And now this—this rude red-headed lass—was the wonderful niece whose praises she had sung discreetly. She glanced again at her stepson. Aware of it he slowly turned to her.

"Well," said Aggy. "Wally! Sir George returned smiling. 'This is a lovely spot, but I had hoped we'd find your brother in New York, or Chicago, by preference. I must say all I've read or heard of Chicago decidedly intrigues me. One of those western towns, Aggy, where the west is the drop of the hat. This is delightful country, Aggy, but I'm shot if it looks any more exciting than Sandisbarre.'

"You never can tell," Aggy hastened to assure him. "It's maybe no slat like Chicago where you were wanting to shoot at and see. Judging from them lassie of Rob's—it's none too peaceful."

"Oh, girls! Sir George's voice was weary. 'I'm sick of girls!'

CHAPTER III

Robert Macbeth had finally made up his mind. He would put matters right to Roberta on her return and then, if she would not do as he wished—he corrected himself—if she would not take the sensible course he pointed out to her, and remain contentedly on the island for a year, then she should feel the heavy hand of authority. Yet he did not feel quite satisfied with himself—either his conscience or his arthritis gave him a twinge.

Not being by any means the "back-number" Roberta thought him, he knew that the heavy hand of authority must be very carefully not to make himself ridiculous. Once put himself in the "heavy father" position with Roberta, and he lost all chance of influencing her, or gaining his point.

He thought regretfully of the good days of his own youth, when a parent's word was law. Then he smiled, for he remembered how little heed he had paid to that law. The moment he was eighteen and knew his trade, he had fled from the overworked Macbeth household and struck out for himself.

While he was at home he had bowed down before to his father, and a fine, tyrannical, old blackguard and humbug that parent had been. Robert never wanted his daughter to think of him in just that way. Yet he expected her to make her the error how was he to make her see the error of her ways? Macbeth knew that eight or eighteen, however intelligent and sophisticated, were scarcely to be trusted to navigate their own little boats on life's crowded river. He had seen a few shipwrecks in his time and he meant to pilot his girl.

He looked up and saw Joe Ligor's car coming down the road toward the island. He rang with impatience, and also rapped loudly with his stick on the floor of the terrace. Then he remembered seeing the chauffeur and the maids leave the island. It dawned on him that he was quite alone.

Wright Brothers Showed Genius in Early Years

According to the first biography of the inventors, "The Wright Brothers: Myths of Flight," by John R. Mifflin, they showed their inventive minds at an early age. When Orville was ten and Wilbur fourteen they constructed a wood-turning lathe out of lumber from the wood pile, parts from an old buggy and marbles for ball bearings. Its power plant was a foot treadle long enough to accommodate the feet of six boys. When Orville was seventeen and Wilbur twenty-one they built a printing press with a second-hand tombstone as the flywheel. Their first revolutionary discovery was made from a cardboard box from which Wilbur had just sold a bicycle inner tube. Orville had previously concluded that lateral balance would be necessary to successful flight. As his brother twisted the sides of the box he evolved the very principle they had been seeking. This became the warp which, in its present form of aileron, is essential to the sideways balance of airplanes.

Castoria corrects CHILDREN'S ailments

WHAT a relief and satisfaction it is for mothers to know that there is always Castoria to depend on when babies get fretful and uncomfortable! Whether it's teething, colic or other little upset, Castoria always brings quick comfort; and, with relief from pain, restful sleep.

And when older, fast-growing children get out of sorts and out of condition, you have only to give a more liberal dose of this pure vegetable preparation to right the disturbed condition quickly.

Because Castoria is made expressly for children, it has just the needed mildness of action. Yet you can always depend on it to be effective. It is almost certain to clear up any minor ailment and cannot possibly do the youngest child the slightest harm. So it's the first thing to think of when a child has a coated tongue, is fretful and out of sorts. Be sure to get the genuine; with Chas. H. Fletcher's signature on the package.

American Birds Guests of Great Ocean Liner

The Olympic arrived at Southampton the other day with the remains of a "deck cargo" of a rather unusual kind. Hundreds of small birds of the sparrow and finch type had been carried out to sea on the liner when she left New York; they were roosting in her rigging when she left at night, and at dawn found themselves too far out at sea to attempt a return flight. These stowaways—attached themselves to the great vessel until she came within sight of the French and English coasts, when they went ashore without complying with any of the passport regulations or making any declarations of alien birth and nationality. The news will be gathered that the whole trip was an accident, but that may be to underestimate the deliberately terrestrial attractions of the modern liner. It may have been less of an accident than a compliment; a tribute as profound as is sincere to the success with which what was once a vessel had been transformed into a hotel. These sparrows would have been perfectly happy under the eaves of a Grand Babylon and if they noted palm courts as they fluttered round the berthed liner in New York how were they to understand that these were not the same sort of furniture as on Fifth avenue? They attached themselves to what they thought was a hotel—and when they found that it was a floating one the hotel was still vast enough to accommodate them without difficulty. Indeed, it ought to have been very glad to see them. Palm courts and shop windows are all very well as incidents in the urban illusion, but nothing could be better than a few sparrows for putting the finishing touches to an accurate reconstruction of city life at sea.—Manchester (Eng.) Guardian.

Aviator Chased Away

Police of Maastricht, England, believe they are the first force in the world to order an air liner to "move on." On his way to Croydon, shortly after midnight, the pilot of a Belgian air liner ran into mist and clouds. Turning, he attempted to reach Lymington, but found his way back to the coast also barred, and for 90 minutes he circled round and round over Maldstone. Many people were alarmed by the low flying of the plane, and the police twice got

The Garrett Laundry Co., purchased Tuesday through the Hanna Motor Sales, a Fargo truck for their delivery service.

Wanted: Position on farm by March 1, by married man with family. Can furnish best of references. Address Box 466, St. Joe.

Chas. Reasoner of this place and Mrs. Woodring of Newville, were united in marriage at Auburn, Tuesday. They will reside at Newville.

Clayton Keeler was called to work Friday at Connersville, at the Auburn plant and he went Sunday. In writing home he reports having driven in snow a foot deep.

Mr. and Mrs. Roy Koch entertained on New Year's Night at dinner, Mr. and Mrs. Bob Thompson, children, Jimmie and Bobbie, and Bruce Koch from Dayton, Ohio, and Mr. and Mrs. Clifton Turnbull.

Clarence Coburn received a check from a Milling Co., of Warsaw, Ind. The check was for one dollar in payment for a poem he had written extolling the merits of a pancake flour made by this company. The poem was read on Monday morning over station W. O. W. O., Port Wayne. This Milling Co., pays one dollar for each poem they accept and read, as a suitable "ad" for their brand of pancake flour.

The program consisted of contests and games as follows: New Year's Journal of happenings; New Year's resolutions given from three words made from the three initials of the individual, bunco and cootie. Partners were chosen by gentlemen and ladies pulling different ends of strings which led them to their partner for refreshments. The mixup that followed was just what every man encounters in choosing a partner in life. About one hour was used to untangle the mess. When all the lines were found to be cast in pleasant places the guests were served to a two course supper, which consisted of: Casserole chicken, scalloped potatoes, Parker house rolls, coffee, brick ice cream and cake.

Two minutes before the hour of twelve, Ray Reasoner went outside and shot two shots with his revolver at the dying of 1930, which excited the guests and some of the natives of the town. Ray says he is just too tender hearted to see anything that's dying, suffer. The guests tarried until late as the good time was too good to leave. Mr. and Mrs. Alva Reasoner and Miss Marion Bagley of Detroit, Michigan, were out-of-town guests.

The "Gentlemen" guests seem to have figured out this year's meeting in the following manner: The fact that the Culture Club is studying a book called "Great American Issues," the fact that married life is one of these great American issues and the fact that the whole evening's entertainment centered around married life, proved to the guests that the women folks were trying to make a deep impression on their husbands. For instance, the games of the journal of happenings, resolutions, cootie, bunco, entanglements in choosing partners, were all symbolic of married life. The men are wondering if the Club was trying to ring from the men a big New Year's resolution by emphasizing the home life by concrete examples or paving the way for a new car. In the spring by giving him a good feed, finding the way to a man's heart through his stomach. Anyhow, the men had a good time and say, thank you, girls.

Choosing His Own Name
At one time it was the custom in the Shetland Islands for a man to select his own surname, and the last man to do this was Gideon Manson. The custom followed was for a son to twist his father's Christian name and make that his surname, a fact which explains why Gideon Manson's grandfather was called Magnus Robertson and his father James Manson (Magnus' son). According to custom, Gideon should have called himself Gideon Jameson (i. e., the son of James), but he chose to be known by his father's surname. This ancient custom led to considerable confusion and was finally prohibited by parliamentary enactment.

The SANDMAN STORY

HIS CHRISTMAS SHOES

TOMMY was not very old. Nor was he so very, very young. That is to say, he was not a baby. Not by any manner of means. He went out to play with others and with an older brother and sister, too.

That was one of the reasons Tommy did not feel so very old. He was the youngest in the family. His sister and his brother were older than he was, and of course, so was his daddy and so was his mother, as we all know.

Christmas had passed and all the boys and girls were talking about the presents they had received.

Tommy's mother had been sick during the fall and his father had been out of work for several weeks and perhaps that may seem a strange present for Tommy to have wanted. He had his good shoes and his old shoes. Only his good shoes were not so very good any longer and his old shoes were so old that he was ashamed of them.

Maybe it seems to some as though a little boy wouldn't be apt to be ashamed of an old pair of shoes. Maybe you think a boy wouldn't think of his appearance and whether he wore old clothes or nice ones.

Maybe boys don't like to dress and fuss and all that sort of thing, but Tommy didn't like the feeling that he hadn't any better shoes to wear.

His Sunday shoes were beginning to show a little wear and his everyday ones were so dreadful.

He felt every one looked at them. He felt he looked poor and he felt as though in some way people pitied him, and though he was only a little boy he hated that.

And he felt they thought somehow it was his mother's fault for getting sick and his father's for being out of work for a while.

He knew it was not. His mother didn't enjoy being sick or taking horrid medicine. And his father didn't enjoy not having work.

He looked very miserable sitting around the house or going out and then coming back again and saying to Tommy's mother:

"No luck, this time. It's hard times this year."

Yes, there were a number of reasons why Tommy wanted shoes.

Then he could wear his Sunday ones for every day and his new ones for Sunday. And if, on the muddy spring days he should wear the very old pair it wouldn't matter then, for he could say, "I just thought I'd wear this old pair, so I could have some fun."

They would know he had a better pair and it would be all right.

On Christmas morning Tommy had awakened with a start when he heard his father shouting out greetings to every one and all the family were wide awake and joyful.

"Mother, feel better than she has for weeks," Tommy heard his father telling his older brother and sister, "and last night Mr. Brown told me he had a job for me!"

Oh, how happy Tommy felt, but even greater than all the family rejoicing, it seemed to him at that moment, was the fact that Santa Claus had called, even though he had had to do so much already. And he had left candy bags and oranges and mittens and a beautiful, shiny, splendid pair of new shoes with a piece of paper sticking out of one, upon which was written:

"Tommy's new shoes, from Santa."

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"A MAN OF STRAW"

"A MAN OF straw," is, as we know, a virtually synonymous with our "dummy"—that is to say, he has neither money nor position—judgments mean nothing to him—he will never lose his reputation, for he never had any worth losing—and so the dummy or man of straw is frequently used as a shield for a responsible principal.

Three hundred years ago, as today, people hid behind dummies—persons who were not worth proceeding against in any legal action.

In those days, however, the dummies could be found at the law courts at Westminster, where they could be identified by the wisps of straw which they displayed, protruding from their shoes, and from which circumstance they became known as straw men.

THE WHY OF SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

SWALLOWS

THAT swallows are birds of luck is a common superstition which is: It is lucky to have a swallow hover about you and lucky is the house under whose eaves a swallow builds its nest. This superstition can clearly be traced back as a heritage from Greek mythology, sifted by the centuries from Greek civilization through the Latin into the Anglo-Saxon. Demeter was the goddess who presided over the fruitfulness of the earth, the patroness of marriage and social order.

When her daughter Proserpine was carried off to the lower world by Pluto, Demeter wandered about looking for her and in the guise of an old woman found a temporary home in the house of Ceres, king of Eleusis.

While there she was accustomed to take to the air in the form of a swallow, darting and skimming about the house and twittering from the eaves.

Finally Demeter revealed her identity to Ceres and it was at Eleusis that the great shrine of her cult was set up. Long after Demeter had left the house of Ceres, the family, naturally, thought, when a swallow descended about the roof, that the goddess was paying them a visit in the form which she had been accustomed to take for outdoor exercise. And so, as the cult of Demeter spread, a certain sanctity attached to the swallow, whose appearance was a possible visit from the goddess, an idea gradually subsiding into an omen of good luck. And that superstition of good luck has persisted even unto the present day.

Windows Bequeathed by Will When Shakespeare was writing and Queen Elizabeth was ruling with the help of Drake and Raleigh and the rest, the windows of a house were a special possession, and could be willed to different people. They were made up of a series of movable casements, meant to be put in and taken out easily; and when a man died they were named in his will and passed to whomsoever he desired to have them.

Lesson for January 11

THE CHILDHOOD OF JESUS

LESSON TEXT—Luke 2:40-52.

GOLDEN TEXT—And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Ideal Childhood.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Growing up for God.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Responsibility of Youth.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Being about the Father's Business.

1. Jesus Growing (v. 40).

While Jesus was as to his personality, God, yet his deity did not interfere with his development as a human being. The processes of his physical, mental, and spiritual growth were the same as those of any normal human being.

1. "Grew and waxed strong." It was necessary for his body to develop. His brain, nerves, and muscles must not only attain unto the proper size but must come to act in unison, become correlated.

2. "Filled with wisdom." As with most children his training was largely in the hands of his mother. She, no doubt, taught him to commit to memory Bible verses and taught him the great stories of the Old Testament, from the creation down through the patriarchs and prophets. It seems that it was customary among the Jews to send the child at the age of six years to the synagogue school, where the Old Testament was the textbook.

3. "And the grace of God was upon him." By the grace of God doubtless, is meant God's loving favor and tender care.

11. Jesus Tarrying Behind at Jerusalem (vv. 41-43).

At the age of twelve years the Jewish child took his place as a worshiper in the temple. He was then considered "a child of the law." He inquired thoroughly into the meaning of the ordinances of God's house. His heart yearned for his Father.

111. Jesus Found in the Temple (vv. 44-47).

When his mother and Joseph had gone some distance on the homeward journey, they perceived that Jesus was not with them and sought for him among their kinsfolk and acquaintances. Not finding him, they returned to Jerusalem and found him in the temple.

1. He was sitting (v. 46). He was perfectly at home in his Father's house.

2. He was hearing the teachers of God's Word (v. 46); and was eager to learn God's will.

3. He asked questions (v. 46). His growing mind was inquisitive; it inquired after—reached out after—truth.

4. He answered questions (v. 47). His answers showed such great wisdom that he astonished those who heard him. It was the expression of the workings of a perfect human mind suffused by the Holy Spirit.

IV. Mary's Complaint (vv. 48-50).

1. Her question (v. 48). "Why hast thou dealt thus with us?" She reproached him for his behavior.

2. Jesus' reply (v. 49). He replied to her question in a dignified yet tender manner, but made no apology, thus indicating that he was more than merely the son of Mary. God was his Father.

3. Mary acquiesced in his revelation of himself (v. 51). She did not understand all these things, but she kept them in her heart.

V. Jesus' Obedience (v. 51).

Though he was fully conscious of his divine being and mission, he lived a life of filial obedience, thus teaching us that obedience to parents is pleasing to God, and a duty which will be discharged faithfully by those who have the spirit of Jesus Christ.

VI. Jesus' Development (v. 52).

1. Mental. "Increased in wisdom." Although the divine nature was united with the human, his mind was left free to develop normally.

2. Physical. He increased in stature. His body developed according to the laws of a normal human being.

3. Spiritual. He increased in favor with God and man. As his mind developed, and his apprehension of God became more comprehensive, the Divine Being could be more fully expressed through him, and as the perfect life was lived, men could recognize his superior qualities, and therefore, their hearts would open to him.

Christian Victory

To trust him and to keep the eye on him is the one secret of all Christian victory.—G. H. Morrison.

The Disease, the Remedy

Review of the Year 1930 at Home and in Other Lands

Unemployment and Economic Depression Generally Prevail—Steps Toward World Peace—Democrats Win in United States Elections—South American Revolutions.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

PROSPERITY, which was "just around the corner" at the beginning of 1930, gave the world no more than an occasional glimpse of her face during the year. Business depression, increasing unemployment, continuing low prices for agricultural products and declining markets for securities prevailed generally.

Skilled observers professed to see war clouds again gathering over the Balkans, but notable steps were taken in the direction of world peace and disarmament. The United States, Great Britain and Japan signed the London naval limitation treaty, and toward the close of the year there were indications that France and Italy, settling their party dispute, would make it a five-power pact. Some progress was achieved by the preparatory disarmament commission of the League of Nations. The revision of German reparations, known as the Young plan, was adopted by all nations concerned and put into effect, although Germany was not hopeful of its ultimate success. The evacuation of the Rhineland by the allied forces was completed.

China's long, bloody and confused civil war ended in victory for the Nationalist government. Popular and military revolutions upset the governments of five Latin-American republics.

Though governmental and other agencies in the United States strove throughout the year to relieve the unfortunate economic conditions, results of these efforts were slow in appearing. Consequently the voters went to the polls in November and expressed their dissatisfaction in the customary manner. There was a Democratic landslide that covered most of the country and the Republican Party virtually lost its control of both houses of the congress that convenes in March, 1931. However, the national leaders of the victorious Democrats pledged their party to co-operation with the Republican administration in all measures designed to bring prosperity around that corner, and business was reassured by the promise that there would be no attempt for some time to revise the tariff act passed in June.

Industrial and financial distress in the United States was greatly increased by drought that prevailed all summer in the Mississippi and Ohio river states and extended as far east as the Virginia. National and state governments afforded speedy relief to the sufferers. As winter neared numerous organizations throughout the country went into action to alleviate the unemployment situation, their aim being to supply those out of work with food rather than charity doles. Public building and highway projects were started and speeded up, and great industrial and transportation concerns sought means to increase the number of their employees.

All in all, 1930 was not a happy year for the world.

INTERNATIONAL

THREE months of intensive debate, diplomatic negotiation, study of experts' figures and mutual concessions brought forth the London naval treaty, which was signed on April 22 by the delegates of the United States, Great Britain, Japan, France and Italy, by this pact the first three powers agreed to the extension of the Washington treaty so that the reduction and limitation of their navies should apply to cruisers and lesser vessels. France and Italy failed utterly to reach an accord as to what their relative naval strength should be. Consequently they subscribed to only those parts of the London treaty that provided for a battleship building "holiday" and prescribed various rules designed to humanize submarine warfare.

France and Italy held intermittent conversations during the rest of the year, but could not settle their differences. The one insurmountable obstacle was Italy's demand that her right to naval parity with France be admitted, and France's flat refusal to yield this point.

League Resolves Briand's Scheme. In September the assembly of the League of Nations listened politely while M. Briand, French foreign minister, expounded his pet scheme for a federation of European states. Other statesmen cautiously praised the plan and it was accepted in principle by the assembly and referred to a special committee which will report to the 1931 meeting.

Twenty-eight of the nations represented at Geneva signed on October 2 a treaty guaranteeing financial aid to any signatory state that is the victim of warlike aggression.

Late in August one of the smaller nations of central Europe held a conference in Warsaw and agreed on a concerted program of action mainly in furtherance of their agrarian interests. The pact was signed by Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, Hungary, Latvia, Poland, Rumania and Yugoslavia. Lithuania was absent because of her political differences with Poland. France was quick to strengthen her friendship with these states by offering credits.

During the year there were many indications that Italy was drawing in to close co-operation with Germany and Russia.

After being ratified by all the nations concerned, the Young plan for reparations was put into effect on May 9. Gates W. McGarragh of New York already had been elected president of the bank for international settlements created by the plan. On May 19 the last of the French troops in the Rhineland began moving out, the evacuation being completed June 30. A separate reparations settlement was signed in April by Hungary, Austria and the states in the little entente.

Frank B. Kellogg, former secretary of state of the United States, was elected a member of the World Court in September to fill out the term of Charles Evans Hughes.

The mandate commission of the League of Nations made in August its long awaited report on the Palestine conflicts between Jews and Arabs, placing the blame on Great Britain. In the fall the British government announced a new policy concerning Palestine which would stop for the present any further immigration of Jews into the Holy Land. Zionists everywhere protested vigorously and President Chaim Weizmann and other chief officers of the World Zionist organization resigned.

Russia's Great Conspiracy Story. Early in November the government of Russia announced that it had uncovered a gigantic plot against the Soviet regime in which a number of "capitalist" states were said to be involved. Among many individuals who were alleged to have a part in the conspiracy were Premier Vladimir Lenin and Foreign Minister Briand of France and Sir Henri Deterding, British oil magnate. Eight Russian engineers were put on trial, confessed and were sentenced to terms in prison. Paris and London looked on the whole thing as a "frame-up."

Late in January Mexico severed diplomatic relations with Russia because of alleged Communist insults. In the United States the advocates of a policy of resumption of relations with the Soviet government were jolted by revelations that the latter had been selling wheat short on the American grain exchanges, aiding in the demoralization of prices at the same time it became evident that the Moscow government was dumping grain in the European markets at prices far below the cost of production. The whole affair created a great stir here and abroad but nothing much could be done about it.

FOREIGN

GREAT BRITAIN'S Labor government struggled manfully throughout the year to solve the nation's economic problems, but found that this could not be done in a short time. Unemployment continued to increase, passing the two million mark in June, and industrial depression was little lightened if at all. However, no one seemed to have a better solution to offer than Prime Minister MacDonald and his ministers, so they held on to their power. They had the aid of a national advisory council, Chancellor Snowden devised a satisfactory budget that was by no means socialistic, and parliament passed some of the legislation asked by the government.

Two matters of vast import demanded much attention from the British empire's rulers. One was the effort to develop the empire as an economic unit, and the imperial conference which was held in London undertook the task. The various dominions were represented by some of their best minds and the discussions continued until well into November. But the results were extremely disappointing. The main issue was economic co-operation, and in this nothing was accomplished because the dominions and the British government could not agree concerning free trade, protection and preferential rates within the empire.

Problem of India.

The increasing independence of the dominions was marked by the tact understanding that henceforth they shall have the right to accredit their own diplomats to foreign countries, and may communicate with one another and with Great Britain, not through the government, but directly. It was decided to create a tribunal for the settlement of intradominion disputes.

The future status of India within the empire was a question that troubled the British throughout the year, and it was complicated by the non-cooperation rebellion conducted by Mahatma Gandhi and his numerous followers. As in their custom, the Communists took advantage of the situation to convert the peaceful revolt of the Indian Nationalists into riotous demonstrations, and the police and military forces had to handle not only these but also attacks on the northwestern frontier by tribesmen. Gandhi and many of his lieutenants were put in prison but their civil disobedience campaign never slackened. One of its frequent manifestations was the making of salt contrary to the laws. The All-India congress, consisting largely of Gandhi's adherents, decided to boycott the roundtable conference arranged for late in the year, because their demand was for the absolute independence of India.

The roundtable conference opened in London November 12 with much pomp and ceremony, the native princes, the Hindus, the Moslems and even the "untouchables" being represented by their ablest men—and by two brilliant women. The Indians made it clear they would accept nothing less than dominion status, and some of them bitterly attacked the British methods of rule in India. The problem before the conference and the government was so complex that there was no chance for its solution for many months. One definite decision reached was that Burma should be made a separate dominion.

In the Canadian national election on July 23 the Conservatives completely upset the Liberal government headed by Prime Minister W. L. Mackenzie King and secured a comfortable majority in the dominion parliament, and Richard B. Bennett, their leader, became prime minister. The new government took steps at once to relieve the unemployment situation and to help the farmers, one being the almost complete discontinuance of immigration from Europe.

German Fascists Win.

As in most other countries, political events in Germany reflected the prevailing discontent of the people, and there it was aggravated by the feeling that they were oppressed by the reparations. Chancellor Mueller and his cabinet resigned in March because of dissatisfaction with the ratification of the Young plan and with the budget and financial reforms proposed. Dr. Heinrich Brüning, centrist leader, became chancellor and formed a minority cabinet. The National Socialists and the Communists kept up continual agitation and President Hindenburg dissolved the reichstag on July 12 in the elections which were held September 14 the National Socialists, commonly called the fascists, won a most surprising and tremendous victory. They increased the number of the seats in the reichstag from 12 to 107, and their popular vote from 300,000 to more than 6,000,000. Their titular leader is Adolf Hitler, who, being an Austrian, could not be elected to the reichstag.

France, Spain and Italy.

One small provision in the finance bill brought about a vote of lack of confidence in the French chamber of deputies in February and the Tardieu ministry was forced to resign. It was succeeded by a Radical-Socialist cabinet formed by Chautemps which was defeated on its first appearance. Tardieu then was recalled, and held on through a stormy summer and fall, but early in December the senate forced him and his cabinet to resign, and Theodore Steeg undertook to form a new ministry. France maintained her position as one of the most prosperous countries of Europe, and gathered an immense store of gold. She was largely preoccupied with national defense and went ahead with her plan for a powerful chain of fortifications on her eastern frontier.

Gen. Primo de Rivera, who had been dictator of Spain for more than six years, resigned on January 23, partly under compulsion, when faced with the threat of a military revolt. He was succeeded by Gen. Damsazo Berenguer. Throughout the year there were repeated strikes, food riots and violent demonstrations by students and in the middle of December a serious rebellion broke out in the northern part of the country.

Economy was the continual cry of the Italian government, Premier Mussolini being its spokesman, and his measures toward that end were put through with thoroughness and dispatch. They extended to the reduction of salaries of all governmental employees, who are remarkably numerous there, and all employers were urged to follow suit. In compensation, the cost of living was brought down by the lowering of prices of food and other necessities. At the same time the Duke continued his program of extensive public works, like drainage and restoration of waste lands, giving employment to many men.

Carol on Rumanian Throne.

Carol, former crown prince of Rumania, with the aid of prominent Rumanians, executed a startling coup d'etat in June. From his exile in France he flew to his native country in an airplane and two days later the parliament declared him king and his little son, who had held the title, heir to the throne. Carol soon began planning for his coronation, but his estranged wife declined to be reconciled and the so-called coronation ceremony could not be held unless she were present or the marriage were dissolved. As a result of this dispute Premier Maniu resigned in October and Carol went ahead with his plans.

An interesting if not important event was the marriage on October 25 of King Boris of Bulgaria and Princess Giovanna, daughter of the king and queen of Italy.

Latin-American Revolutions.

Revolt flamed in four South American republics. Four men who had been virtual dictators were ousted. Four new governments were established. As a preliminary to these events there was a revolution in the Dominican republic in February, the immediate cause being the announced intention of President Horacio Vasquez to stand for re-election. After a few skirmishes Vasquez was forced out of office, being succeeded temporarily by General Urena. Elections were held May 10 and Gen. Rafael Trujillo was chosen president and inaugurated three months later.

Bolivia was next on the list. There Dr. Hernando Siles tried, like Vasquez, to perpetuate his rule and was driven from office in May by the insurgents. He was persecuted after his flight, and his much hated right hand man, Gen. Hans Kuntz of Prussia, fled back to his German home. A military junta took over the government, its chief being Gen. Carlos Blanco Gallardo.

Peru followed suit in August. The officers of the army led a movement against President Augusto B. Leguia who had held the office for more than ten years and considered himself almost irremovable. He was forced to resign, turning over his powers to a military junta, and later Lieut. Col. Luis M. Sanchez Cerro was made provisional president. Leguia had been recognized as an efficient business president and had made great material strides during his regime, but the revolutionists accused him of "denial of civil liberties" and also of nepotism and the sale of concessions. He was imprisoned to await trial.

Late in August President Hipolito Yrigoyen of Argentina was warned by his minister of justice that a revolution might break out immediately. A few days later the prediction was fulfilled, the high army and navy officers leading their commands in a revolt that speedily ousted the aged chief executive, who was seriously ill. Only in Buenos Aires was there any popular opposition to the revolution, and this was soon quelled with some bloodshed. Gen. Jose Francisco Uriburu, chief of the insurgents, became the provisional president on September 6. Yrigoyen for years had enjoyed great personal popularity in Argentina, was president from 1916 to 1922 and was elected again in 1928. But he had become senile and sick and lost his hold on the people.

Vargas Rules Brazil.

Brazil's revolution broke out early in October and was in a way a war between the states, the leader of each striving to seize the central government. The term of President Washington Luis was soon to expire but his favored candidate, Dr. Julio Prestes, president of the state of Sao Paulo, had been elected, allegedly by fraud. The defeated liberal candidate, Dr. Getulio Vargas, former president of the state of Rio Grande do Sul, started a revolt to prevent the inauguration of Prestes, and the movement spread to state after state, all the insurgent armies converging on Rio de Janeiro, the national capital. The government resisted stubbornly, but considerable parts of the army and navy deserted to the rebels. A few weeks of bitter fighting Luis was ousted. The members of the junta that took over the government at once began quarreling and scheming, but Vargas promptly came up from the south with a large force of gaucho soldiers and his authority was recognized. He was installed as provisional president on November 3.

Pascual Ortiz Rubio was inaugurated as president of Mexico on February 5 and selected a strong cabinet under whose rule the country promises to prosper. Especial attention is being paid to reorganization of agriculture and education.

DOMESTIC

WITH less cause for complaint than the people of most other countries, the inhabitants of the United States were nevertheless dissatisfied and pessimistic. Overproduction by farmers and manufacturers and timidity of consumers resulted in business depression and unemployment that lasted throughout the year, despite all efforts to restore prosperity. The great drought played its evil part, affecting conditions in the entire country.

President Hoover's administration had another exceedingly difficult year. In the senate the Democrats were re-inforced by the radical Republicans and the coalition fought many of the Chief Executive's bills. After more than six months of debate the senate passed the Smoot tariff bill, embracing two features that were obnoxious to the President. These were the export duty provision, carried over from the old farm relief legislation, and a clause transferring the flexible tariff power from the President to congress. The house of representatives eliminated these features, the senate was forced to yield, and on June 14 the so-called Hawley-Smoot tariff measure was finally enacted. It reached the highest protective level of any tariff law passed since the average rate added 20 per cent above that of the Fordney-McCumber bill of 1922. In its entirety it was anti-trade to nobody, but President Hoover signed it because he saw in its flexible provision the means of righting its injustices. Protests against the higher duties were received from many foreign governments.

Veterans' Pension Act.

There was another long and bitter struggle over the veterans' pension bill. As first passed by congress it was wholly objectionable to the administration and was promptly vetoed, partly because it incurred in active service and partly because it went "beyond the financial necessities of the situation." The house sustained the veto but the senate repassed the bill with some amendments. These were rejected by the representatives and the measure fairly acceptable to the administration was passed and signed. It inaugurated a vast pension system for all partly or wholly disabled veterans not already receiving compensation, no matter what their illness or when contracted. Soon after the enactment of this law the President put into effect the consolidation of the three bureaus that had been in charge of veterans of all wars and appointed Gen. Frank T. Hines as chief.

Some of the recommendations of the Wickersham law enforcement commission were adopted by congress, the most important being the transfer of the prohibition bureau from the treasury to the department of justice. The change was made on July 1. Col. Amos W. W. Woodcock took command of the new bureau and former Commissioner James M. Moran was made head of a new industrial alcohol bureau under the treasury department.

When William Howard Taft resigned as chief justice of the Supreme court on February 3, only five days before his death, President Hoover immediately named Charles Evans Hughes to succeed him. The appointment was confirmed by the senate with 26 votes in opposition. Then Associate Justice Edward Terry Sanford of New Jersey and Mr. Hoover picked North Carolina to fill the vacancy. Labor and negro organizations rose in opposition and the senate rejected the nomination by a vote of 41 to 39. The President then named Owen J. Roberts for the place and he was accepted.

Prohibition and the Election.

Prohibition, as a political issue increased in importance as the months passed. A poll conducted by the Literary Digest indicated that the country was largely in favor of repeal of the Eighteenth amendment or at least of modification of the enforcement law. The liquor question was a great factor in the pre-election campaign in many states and had a decided effect on the results when the people went to the polls on November 4. The voters of Illinois, Rhode Island and Massachusetts in a referendum were against prohibition by large majorities.

The election turned out to be very much of a landslide for the Democratic party. The Republican majority in both senate and house were almost wiped out for the next congress, and many states and cities elected Democratic officials to replace Republicans. Naturally the more rabid opponents of the administration saw in all this a severe rebuke for President Hoover and his policies; but sane opinion was that it was the natural result of unfortunate economic conditions.

With large appropriations available, the farm board worked for the relief of agriculture by promoting and financing various co-operatives; and later in the year undertook, with some success, to stabilize the price of wheat, which had fallen rapidly in all world markets. In this latter operation the board was forced to accumulate something like 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, the future disposal of which was an unsolved problem. Chairman Legez of the board campaigned successfully for reduction of the diplomatic appointments by the President were: Ralph H. Booth, minister to Denmark; Fred M. Dearing, ambassador to Peru; John N. Willys, ambassador to Poland; Harford W. MacNider, minister to Canada; W. Cameron Forbes, ambassador to Japan; W. M. Jardine, minister to Egypt; Herman Bernstein, minister to Hungary, and J. Reuben Clark, Jr., ambassador to Mexico.

Taking of the fifteenth decennial census began on April 2. The final figures, announced in November, gave the population of the United States as 122,775,046. The increase for the decade was about 16.1 per cent.

On November 23, President Hoover appointed William N. Doak of Virginia secretary of labor to succeed James J. Davis, who had been elected senator from Pennsylvania.

The short session of congress opened December 2, and the President's message was largely concerned with measures of relief. Following to a great extent his recommendations, congress appropriated more than one hundred millions for an emergency construction program designed to aid the unemployment situation, and also set aside a large fund for loans to farmers who had suffered from the drought. Mr. Hoover transmitted to the senate the revised protocols of the World court and asked early action on them.

NECROLOGY

FIRST among the eminent Americans who died in 1930 must be placed William Howard Taft, who had been governor general of the Philippines, chief justice of the Supreme court of the United States and President of the Republic. On the day Mr. Taft died, March 8, Associate Justice Edward Terry Sanford of the Supreme court also passed away. Elmer A. Sperry, inventor of the gyrocompass, and Glenn H. Curtiss, pioneer in aviation, were taken by death, as were also Congressman Stephen G. Porter of Pennsylvania, indomitable foe of the "dope" traffic; Bishop C. P. Anderson, primate of the Episcopal church in America; Harry Payne Whitney, financier and sportsman, and Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, chief of staff of the American army during the World war.

AND TAX EXEMPTION

Indianapolis, Ind., Jan. 13, 1931.—Legislation to provide more effective enforcement of weight regulations on highways and automobile license fees or gas tax to any purpose other than roads were the two outstanding features in the legislative meeting of the Board of Directors of the Hoosier State Automobile Association held Friday afternoon in Indianapolis. They pointed out in particular "that there is no reason why automobile license fees should be increased and especially is there no justification in putting on a 100% increase in license fees and putting this increase into the general fund to be used for the purposes other than highways."

Their answer to the suggestion that the personal property tax be removed from automobiles in lieu of the 100% increase in license fees is "that the Association has, on different occasions from a legal standpoint, gone carefully into that subject and that the State Constitution will not permit the elimination of the personal property tax from automobiles so the result would be that if an increase in license fees would be made with the expectancy that the personal property tax would be removed, that the motoring public would find that it would still have the property tax to pay as well as the increase in license fees."

They point out, also, "that there is much abuse in the use of the one cent (1c) gas tax that is already allotted to the counties and that the State Highway Department, as a unit, will get more construction and more maintenance, dollar for dollar, than can be got through spending the same money through 92 county units. The view of the Association officials is that if the money is kept by the Highway Department the Commission can steadily take on more mileage and get more for the money than can be got in any other way."

"In addition to the bill for the enforcement of weight regulations the Association will sponsor again the bill that was passed by the Senate at the last session, but failed in the House, which provides for a limit to the width, height and length of vehicles and for special warning lights at night where such vehicles are in excess of the ordinary passenger car width. They will sponsor what is known as the "A. A. A. Safety Responsibility Bill" the principals of which are a law already under which a third of the motorists in the United States now drive and over half of the motorists in Canada are driving."

"In addition to whatever penalties other State laws now or later would provide for, the safety responsibility law would bar from the road the incompetent and reckless driver who had caused an accident and had judgment rendered against him, until he had furnished satisfactory proof of ability to compensate financially for any future damages he might cause and to make reasonable restitution for the damage he had already caused for which judgment had been rendered. The Association officials point out in particular that they are absolutely opposed to compulsory automobile insurance and that it is impractical and by actual test has been found to be impractical, and that further it penalizes the careful drivers who constitute probably 98% of the motoring public but the Safety Responsibility act would reach that 2% of reckless and incompetent drivers who cause practically all the trouble. The Association sponsored a bill of somewhat similar character to this at the previous session of the Legislature, and the present bill is free from some objections that were maintained against the bill offered at the last session."

"The Association expects to sponsor a bill for Uniform Municipal Traffic Regulations. We believe there should be a standard type of adequate warning signs carried on school buses; that there should be some limit to the use of solid tires on trucks on highways; that it might be a good thing to have an eye test and an oral examination and driving instructions for all new automobile drivers when they apply for a driver's license. We believe that such requirements for new drivers could be provided without any additional expense and taken care of by the State Motor Police and the police authorities of the various municipalities of the State."

DOINGS OF THE COMMISSIONERS COURT

The county commissioners in their January session, ending Wednesday, Calvin C. Kain, county surveyor, of Thomas C. Guildin as first deputy at a salary of $175 a month, Chas. C. Dick as qualified assistant at $150 a month. Mrs. Mabel Kain as stenographer at $3 a day and $150 a month for any other qualified assistant.

The appointment of a deputy sheriff at a salary of $1,200 a year was authorized.

J. P. Heinlen of Garrett, was given the contract for dry goods and groceries for the county farm for the ensuing quarter. E. A. Baker of Auburn, received the bread contract.

Dr. C. P. Fox of Garrett, was re-appointed as physician for the county jail and county asylum at a salary of $200 a year.

The board set the dog tax at $3 for each male or spayed female, $5 for each unspayed female and $5 for each additional dog, male or female.

Ira Bone and Byron Widney were appointed viewers for the Martin Everetts road in Franklin and Troy townships.

Following a hearing on remonstrances, the assessment of Wm. Potter for the John H. Smith drain in Franklin township was ordered reduced $40, that of Nellie Potter $75, that of Benjamin F. Meyers $60 and that of Lewis Wagner $150.

The commissioner of construction for the Yarde drain filed a certificate of unpaid assessments and bonds for the amount were ordered sold.

ANOTHER SLASH
IN TRAIN SERVICE

Beginning Sunday, train No. 8, due at St. Joe, from the west, at 9:37, will be taken off, and then there will be no service at all at St. Joe.

The express service is rotten and continues to make no improvement. The mail is hauled in box cars on the B. & O., and the parcel post arrives on the local freight at just any old time and the first class mail arrives just about as regular. The mail clerks are so busy sleeping that they forget to dispatch the first class mail, on the Wabash trains, practically every week.

Uncle Sam is paying for a service that's not being delivered and he ought to be looking into the matter, rather than letting the railroads tell him what they are going to do.

At the B. & O. there is no trains, no passengers, no loafers, no fire only in the ticket office and the next move in order to economize will be for the agent to hang out at the stores or the town hall, where fire is kept going, and allow his office fire to die out.

Our business men and citizens ought to unite and make a concentrated effort to have some sort of service restored to our community.

What do you think?
Do you care what is done?

DEKALB COUNTY HAS
44 ONE-ROOM SCHOOLS

DeKalb county has more one-room schools than any other county in Indiana north of Indianapolis, according to statistics in the hands of Carl Stallman, county superintendent of schools.

This may not sound so well to proponents of consolidated schools, but on the other hand, comparison proves that the average grades in examinations are up with or better than many counties in the state supporting consolidated schools.

There are 44 one-room schools in DeKalb county with as many teachers. A program has been mapped out by Mr. Stallman which gives the teachers in DeKalb county more classes and time for class and individual work approximating that in consolidated schools.

The excellent work of the teachers in the rural schools of DeKalb county has much to do with the success of the work in this county. Mr. Stallman from reports compile from over the state took the medium grade on examinations on particular subjects and compared it with the medium average grade on the same subject on examination papers from the schools of this county.

The counties with which the comparisons were based were those having consolidated schools located near large centers like Indianapolis, and in Lake county in the industrial area and he found that in the seventh grade reading, one-room schools in DeKalb county scored 49 as against 45 for the other schools. In seventh grade arithmetic our schools scored 29 against 25 and in seventh grade physiology our schools scored 31 to their 28.

In fifth grade history our average score was 29; theirs was 28 and in geography our fifth grades scored an average of 30 to their 29.

In fourth grade arithmetic our schools scored 25, theirs 24; history, ours scored an average of 21, theirs 19, and in geography our score was 35 and theirs was 33.

In third grade language our one-room schools scored an average of 47 while counties in which there were consolidated schools scored 45.

DEKALB COUNTY TO SEND LARGE DELEGATION TO PURDUE

DeKalb County will have one of the largest delegations to the Agricultural Conference which is held at Purdue University this week in the history of the county. It has been the policy for the last three years for the various township home bureaus to send their two project leaders and the presidents to the Agricultural Conference as a reward for their services to the club. Those going to the Conference from the nearby townships are as follows:

Concord, Mrs. A. J. Washler; Jackson, Mrs. Blanche McNamara, Mrs. Lois Maginnis, Mrs. Lola Carper; Spencer, Miss Elizabeth Hart, Mrs. Ora Wilmot, Mrs. Dora Wilder, Mrs. Claudia Hafner.

The winners in the Auburn Chamber of Commerce will also be in attendance at the Conference during the week. These men are planning to attend the corn judging school each morning from 8:00 to 9:30 to learn to become corn judges. Those who are going as guests of the Auburn Chamber of Commerce are as follows: Karl Pankop, Floyd Dixon, Harry Shull, Orrie C. Brand, Albert Yoder, Ed. Mertz, Lester Boger, Harry Provines, L. N. Chapman and Ralph Bartels.

CITIZEN DIES

Mrs. Virginia Lawson, 83, a resident of St. Joe for the past twelve years, is the fourth death here for the new year, passing away Friday evening at 8 o'clock with Septicemia.

Mrs. Lawson moved here from Reynolds, Indiana, after two of her children moved into the community. Charles Lawson of north of Concord and Mrs. Harvey Lindley of west of St. Joe. Two other children, Walter Lawson lives at Logansport, and Mrs. Ada Langwell at Bloomington.

Funeral services were held from the home Sunday afternoon, conducted by Rev. Aldrich of Butler, and burial was made Monday at Reynolds, Ind., by E. R. Kinsey with services at the Church of Christ at one o'clock.

YOUNGSTER UPSET ACID

Morris Hurni had a very narrow escape Tuesday evening of being severely burned with sulphuric acid at the cream station. He was about to help his father wash the testing tubes and reached up to get a brush when he struck the acid upsetting it onto his clothing. Mr. Hurni was called and he proceeded to undress the youngster hurriedly, with only a slight burn as the result.

The county gravel roads, in this section where needed, are being resurfaced by Wm. Keeler.

The Sunday evening snow has caused many accidents, and especially on the pavements. The snow was extremely wet, and packed to the ground. Heavy traffic made the roads as smooth as glass. Mrs. Mary Carson, 73, died at Angola Monday, due to injuries received when her car skidded on road 20 east of Angola. Nine persons were hurt on Lincoln Highway near Van Wert, when a car collided with the Greyhound bus. Many other cars were off the roads.

A letter from Eloise Bowman, who is attending school at Bloomington, and received by her parents Wednesday morning, gives information that the water supply situation was critical, and unless rain, of great quantity is to fall within the next few weeks, the college will have to close down. Some weeks ago the supply of water was put on the list for conservative use. It takes 7 inches of water per week from the reservoir to run them. Just what will be done to relieve the situation has not been determined.

Lesson for January 18

THE MINISTRY OF JOHN THE BAPTIST

LESSON TEXT—Luke 3:7-17.
GOLDEN TEXT—Bring forth therefore fruits worthy of repentance, and begin not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, That God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus and John the Baptist.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus and John the Baptist.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—A Courageous Reformer.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Message of John the Baptist.

I. The Degeneracy of the Times (vv. 1, 2).

The Jews had sunk to a very low level of civil, moral and religious life. Luke carefully enumerates the civil and religious rulers in order to show the profligacy of the times and therefore the need of a messenger to call the people back to God and virtue. Caesar has been described as "talented, ambitious, cruel, licentious, infamous, inhuman." Civil rule was divided between four of Rome's vassals. Pontius Pilate a little later attained notoriety by unjustly and in a cowardly manner condemning Jesus to death. Herod, the son of Herod the Great, was a murderer. Annas and Caiaphas were corrupt ecclesiastical rulers.

II. The Nature of John's Ministry (vv. 3-6).

Out of the wilderness John flashed forth, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins (v. 3). The baptism was a sign of repentance. His ministry is declared to be a fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy. He is described as one calling upon the nation to prepare for the coming of the Messiah. The only hope for the world is God's salvation through Jesus Christ. The valleys of righteousness need to be filled. The mountains and hills of sin need to be brought low. The crooked ways of commerce need to be straightened, and the rough ways of society and nations need to be smoothed. Let men accept Jesus Christ and all war and contention will end. Men will then love each other.

III. The Content of John's Message (vv. 7-18).

1. A denunciation of sin (vv. 7, 8). He called the people "a generation of vipers." He charged them with being essentially wicked and deceitful. Knowing the subtle hypocrisy of these Jews, he demanded evidence of their sincerity.

2. An announcement of judgment (v. 9). He declared that the ax was laid at the root of the tree and that the tree not bringing forth fruit was to be hewn down and cast into the fire. John made it very plain that for their sins they should be called into judgment. To be brought face to face with judgment has a sobering effect upon men. Paul's preaching of a judgment to come made Felix tremble (Acts 24:25). While John preached sin and judgment, he accompanied it with the assurance of pardon on condition of repentance.

3. Instructions to the inquirers (vv. 10-14). (1) The people (vv. 10, 11). Each man was to turn from his besetting sin and show love and kindness to his fellow men. Clothing and food were to be given to those who had need. The people were to turn from a life of selfishness and greed and do unto others as they would be done by. (2) Publicans (vv. 12, 13). These taxgatherers who were guilty of greed and oppression were not asked to give up their occupation, but to exact only that which was appointed by law. (3) The soldiers (v. 14). These were probably the policemen of that day, at least men on military duty. They were to refrain from false accusation and doing violence to men, and to be content with their wages.

4. Testimony to Jesus (vv. 15-18). The people were musing in their hearts as to whether John was indeed the Messiah. When John perceived this he, with fine humility, declared that his mission was so lowly by comparison with that of Christ that he would be unworthy to perform the menial act of a slave in loosing the latchet of his shoes. John baptized with water, but Christ would baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire.

IV. John's Imprisonment (vv. 19, 20).

Because of his reproof of Herod for his lewdness and other sins, John went to the dungeon and eventually was beheaded. God's faithful prophets are usually despised by the world, and some are even imprisoned, burned, or beheaded.

Faith

It is the wind that carries the ship across the waves; but the wind is powerless unless the hand of the boatman is held firmly upon the rudder, and the rudder is set hard against the wind. This is the attitude of steadfast faith to divine omnipotence. We hold the rudder; God fills the sails. It is not the rudder that carries the ship, but it is the rudder which catches the wind which carries the ship. And so God keeps us in perfect peace while we are stayed in him.—A. B. Simpson.

Made Savages Curious

An American archeologist and writer who recently led an airplane expedition into Latin America brought back a great deal of interesting and valuable material in the way of pictures of ancient ruins and primitive life. The most interesting experience was that among the San Blas Indians, who inhabit the islands off the shore of Guatemala, whose attire consisted largely of gold rings worn in the ears and nose. Their curiosity about the visitors was intense and sometimes embarrassing. The leader of the expedition was alarmed to see his wife seized by a number of native women and carried into a tent. The guide was sent to protect her, but soon returned and said that the lady was safe. It developed that the native women were curious about her clothing and she obliged them by removing a great deal of her dry goods.

NOTICE OF THE FILING OF A PETITION FOR AN IMPROVED GRAVEL ROAD IN FRANKLIN AND WILMINGTON TOWNSHIP, DEKALB COUNTY, INDIANA

Notice is hereby given to the property owners of Franklin and Wilmington Townships, DeKalb County, Indiana, and to all others concerned that there was filed in the office of the Auditor of DeKalb County, Indiana, on the 8th day of January, 1931, a petition for the construction of an improved gravel road in Franklin and Wilmington Townships, DeKalb County, Indiana, the beginning, the route and terminus of said road, the materials to be used, the width of the road and a general description of the same being set out in the petition in words and figures as follows, to-wit:

State of Indiana,
County of DeKalb, ss:

Before the Board of Commissioners of DeKalb County, Indiana In the Matter of the Petition by William Fetter, et al. for a Free, Improved Gravel Road on the Township Line between Franklin and Wilmington Townships, DeKalb County, Indiana

To the Honorable Board of Commissioners of DeKalb County, Indiana:

The undersigned, being more than fifty (50) adult freeholders and voters of Franklin and Wilmington Townships, both in DeKalb County, Indiana, of which at least ten are from each of the said townships, do hereby petition your Honorable Board that the following described highway, to-wit: Beginning at a point on the township line between Franklin and Wilmington Township, DeKalb County, Indiana on the section line between section three (3) in Wilmington Township and Section thirty-four (34) in Franklin Township where the Butler-Hamilton road intersects said township line and running thence west approximately one and three quarters miles on said township line to a point 1000 feet east of the north-west corner of Section Four (4) in Wilmington Township and there to end, shall be constructed, established and improved by the construction of a turpentine gravel road over the entire route of the road described.

Your petitioners would further show to the Board that the said proposed highway runs on its entire length on a township line and that it connects at its east terminus with the Cloyd Snyder Highway, a part of the county road system of DeKalb County and that it also intersects with the Butler-Hamilton Road, also a part of the county highway system of DeKalb County.

Your petitioners further say that they recommend that the grade of the said proposed road be twenty-four (24) feet in width and that the said highway to twelve (12) feet in width and that the same be improved by placing gravel thereon to the depth of ten inches and that the said highway shall be sufficiently graded and drained before placing thereon the materials for the said improvement.

Your petitioners further say that there is a necessity of the improvement of said road for the following reasons:

1. That the said is a township line road and it is now a poor road and will be for public utility when completed and that the benefits derived therefrom will exceed the cost of construction.

2. That the present system of maintaining and keeping up said road is a failure and inadequate to keep the road in condition for travel.

3. That the said highway is a part of a United States Mail Route.

4. That the most practical way to build said roads and to keep it in repair is to construct it under the laws of the State of Indiana, relating to the construction of highways on township lines, so that the same may become a part of the gravel road system of DeKalb County, Indiana and be maintained by the said DeKalb County, Indiana.

That the aforesaid road when completed will be approximately one and three quarters miles in length.

Wherefore your petitioners pray your Honorable Board that the said highway described herein be established and improved by grading, draining and graveling as a turpentine gravel road in accordance with the laws of the State of Indiana relating to the construction of highways on township line roads.

$200.00 Paid for One Copper Cent

J. D. Martin of Richmond, Va., is the proud possessor of a check for $200.00 paid him for an old copper cent. The Numismatic Company, Dept. 653, Fort Worth, Texas, who purchased this penny from Mr. Martin, says there are numerous old coins, bills and stamps in circulation for which they will gladly pay big cash premiums. So that you will know the value of old coins and stamps and what to watch for in your change, the Numismatic Company will send for only 4c to any reader of this paper who writes them, a large illustrated coin folder describing some of these wanted articles and the big profits to be made. Better write them today for this large folder so you can post yourself and know just what to look for. Remember that Mr. Martin's knowing the value of his penny meant a difference of $199.99 to him. Without knowing its value that penny might still be in circulation, passing through the hands of thousands until someone like Mr. Martin, who knows old coins, recognized its value. It pays to be posted. Send 4c now for the illustrated coin folder. You have nothing to lose, everything to gain.

LARGE BEER CARGO SEIZED BY SHERIFF

Approximately 100 cases of Regal Canadian beer was seized by Sheriff Fred Lunz and his deputies Monday morning when a large truck trailer was wrecked on the Mayaville road at Lunz's corner. The driver of the truck escaped and although Sheriff Lunz had his deputies patrol the highway no one was found driving a truck along the road.

The accident was reported to Sheriff Lunz about 10 o'clock Monday morning. A wheel was broken on the trailer and a wreck car was called to the scene to haul the vehicle to the Allen county jail where the beer was unloaded.

Some of the beer was stolen from the trailer before the sheriff and his deputies arrived on the scene of the accident.

Persons passing the scene of the accident started to load the beer into their automobiles and drive away. This made it impossible for Sheriff Lunz to learn how much beer was on the trailer but it is believed the cargo had a retail value of approximately $1,000. It is not known if the truck also was loaded with beer but it is believed that it was.

There were several machines parked near the trailer when the sheriff arrived but persons in these automobiles had no chance to load any of the beer into their cars for the entire cargo was seized at once by the sheriff. One man was made to unload several cases he had placed in an automobile.

The trailer bore Michigan license plates and is believed to have been used by a Detroit beer runner.

COUNTRY PRESS INDISPENSABLE BRANCH OF GENERAL EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM

No branch of general education reaches the masses of the American people can point to greater achievements than can country journalism. Country papers stand in the front line of defense against schemes that rob the people. They work to encourage industries and payrolls, build up small communities and make more business for everybody.

According to N. W. Ayer & Son's Newspaper Directory for 1930, 9,261 daily and weekly newspapers in towns of 25,000 and under, report 18,383,736 subscribers. As the directory lists over 12,500 of these papers in the 48 states, it is evident that at a most conservative estimate for those not giving circulation figures the rural press must have in excess of 20,000,000 subscribers. Practically none of this subscription list is duplicated; it is seldom that the same person takes two country newspapers. Any way it can be figured, these 20,000,000 subscriptions reach many more than that number of readers, for there is at least a man and a woman in nearly every home where a paper is delivered.

It is a great mistake to overlook or exclude the country newspaper in general advertising campaigns. The Manufacturer and Industrial News Bureau believes that these newspapers reach a greater potential buying market in a more direct manner than probably any other medium.

When national advertisers contemplate the expenditure of money for general advertising, it would be in the interest of the most uniform distribution of products and business to divide advertising appropriations so that a fair portion of them would be used in the country press. The small publishers advocate policies which tend to maintain sound conditions in this country, but, too often, when there is any business to be passed around by large industries, it goes only to the big fellows in the publishing business. If local dealers would call the attention of manufacturers to their local paper, this would mean much to the community as well as to advertisement.

In its contact with industrial leaders The Manufacturer and Industrial News Bureau has always preached the advertising value of the smaller city dailies and country weeklies, believing that they are entitled to a share of the advertising appropriations made by large industries. It has pointed out that an advertisement in the home town paper presents the merits of a product to the intimate friends circle of the home. It emphasizes the fact that a newspaper in a small community is as necessary to the life of that community as the school or the bank. There is no means of reaching these home owners and buyers with a description of the merits of a product or service as directly as through the columns of the local paper, which is intimately connected with all matters affecting the daily life of local citizens, who read it.

Country weeklies and smaller city dailies make themselves more and more community builders in the true sense of the word. At the intersections of the main highways and paved streets they attract payrolls and industries, where such enterprises are not yet overdone as they are in many of the over-crowded half-million and multi-million populated world centers. The national development tendency is away from the metropolitan metropolises where free play of individualism is reduced to a minimum.

In the great open spaces there are still thousands of weeklies and small dailies owned and edited by individuals who alone dictate their own policies—men and women with their own money and their own plans and many of them still actual practical printers.

The country press is helping create prosperous smaller industrial cities and country places. It is helping to give employment to thousands of families, men, women and young people. It furnishes the United States with a news paper service in every small city and town that is not equaled elsewhere in the world.

The smaller newspapers and cities can become successful community builders, leaders for industrial development, and multipliers of payrolls, which, in turn, furnish subscribers and advertisers.

The paper that makes itself the exponent of payrolls and industries helps found the prosperous community and shares in the community prosperity.

Blessed Collar Button

By CLARISSA MACKIE

(Copyright.)

DANIEL MARSH was dressing to go out for the evening. He hadn't quite decided whether he would go to a theater or to one of the smart hotels where he could dine in more or less state, and then remain for dancing, anyway, and it was not likely that any of them would happen to be at the hotel tonight, just because he was feeling rather lonely in the big city. Dan was making good in a very fine position downtown. "Blazes!" he exclaimed wrathfully, when a collar button eluded him in the traditional manner and landed with a thud near the steam radiator. He spread a newspaper down on the floor, and kneeling down gingerly examined around and underneath the warm heater. Dust—dust—some burnt matches—nothing else. Then he saw the square opening around the steam pipe, where it entered the room.

Something gleamed in the shallow hole and Daniel fished for it with a knife blade. He brought his find carefully to the surface and took it to the bureau. Then for the second time that night, Dan Marsh yelled, "Blazes!"

The collar button was not there, but he had brought out of the hole a beautiful diamond ring together with a lot of dust. It was a woman's ring, with two very fine stones in an exquisite setting.

"Now for the collar button," said Dan remorselessly, and stepping back felt something under his foot. It was the collar button, squashed flat.

Fifteen minutes later, Daniel Marsh left the house immaculately attired and with his foot on the first round of the ladder of adventure. In his waistcoat pocket was the diamond ring and the flattened collar button. On the way downstairs he had interviewed Mrs. Weed, his landlady.

"I was wondering who had occupied my room, before I came," said Dan. "I found a book there—" he had the book under his arm, a modern novel.

"Oh, Miss Pearson must have left it here—I don't believe she wanted it. She was always losing things—lost her diamond ring right in the room the very day she left. I told her that I didn't suspect Amanda, the maid, and she was real nice about it."

"I suppose she went home," ventured Dan. "No—it happened this way—well, she couldn't afford to stay here—so she took a cheaper room around at Miss Gilroy's on Amsterdam avenue."

With this information Dan decided not to go down to the hotel and dance, he would follow the leading of the blessed collar button—he was beginning to call it that.

He dined at a neighborhood restaurant, and then found his way to Miss Gilroy's apartment. A colored maid answered the door.

"Miss Pearson, yes, sir. Here's a gentleman to see you, Miss Pearson," she said and led him into a small living room, where some one was playing softly on the piano. The playing stopped, and the player arose and faced Daniel Marsh.

"I am Miss Pearson," she said coldly.

Dan quailed before the forbidding countenance of a middle-aged woman, but he found courage to inquire whether she had not boarded with Mrs. Weed.

"I don't owe her a cent of money," said Miss Pearson stiffly.

"Of course not," soothed Daniel Marsh. "I merely came to inquire about—you lost a diamond ring, didn't you?"

"I never talk to reporters," sniffed the singular Miss Pearson, "besides, I found the ring in my trunk—lost it while packing."

"You couldn't tell me who occupied that room before you did?" ventured Daniel once more.

"I could tell you that—it was Miss Lincoln—Elsie Lincoln, she's a stenographer in the Updown bank—she moved to another house and still takes her meals at Mrs. Weed's."

The Updown bank—his own place of employment! And Miss Lincoln was Mr. Bradish's stenographer—the prettiest girl Daniel had ever seen—curling black hair, soft blue eyes and a creamy skin—a girl that seemed like home girls, somehow.

Did Daniel Marsh's alarm clock go off an hour earlier the next morning? It did! Did he make himself more than immaculate? Yes, even so, and he hurried downstairs at 7:15 to eat breakfast at Mrs. Weed's now glorified table. Heretofore, he had preferred to eat anywhere else than that dismal board. He waited a half-hour before Elsie Lincoln came down in her smart little hat and spring suit. Her cheeks were rosy when he came and sat beside her.

Daniel Marsh asked her about a ring—had she ever lost one? Yes, indeed she had—she described it minutely, said her dearest daddy had given it to her, and she just didn't know whether it was on the street or in the house. It had simply vanished.

Mrs. Weed glimpsed the pantomime from the pantry door. "These young folks," she groaned, "strangers one day and engaged the next—he giving her a ring so soon!"

One day they told her—and Elsie displayed a very large solitary diamond set in platinum. As for the collar button that really brought them together, it occupies a tiny frame, and only Dan and Elsie know its meaning.

Down With Stockton

By JANE OSBORN

(Copyright.)

IT WAS an unwritten law in the Stockton family that college students were not to be considered in the light of possible husbands—at least students in Gleason college where Doctor Stockton had reigned as president for these twenty years. The four older daughters had followed this rule and found husbands elsewhere. Lucy Stockton remained, living a solitary enough existence with her father and the old housekeeper.

Lucy was twenty, but she had come to the conclusion that if one couldn't marry a Gleason student then it was a waste of time to notice them at all. She saw them by the hundreds at college celebrations; she even talked to them occasionally when they appeared as a matter of duty at the president's receptions. But the best looking, straightest limbed athlete among them did not concern her more than the most bow-legged, stoop-shouldered, bespectacled little grind. They were just students belonging to a sort of third sex so far as Lucy was concerned.

And Lucy's air of complete disinterest rather pleased her pedagogical father, for Lucy was quite the prettiest of his daughters, and there was an archness about her eyes and a daintiness to her rather short nose that indicated a streak of flirtatiousness in her nature. There had been times, when Lucy was much younger, when Doctor Stockton had felt concerned. It really would never do to have one of the girls marry one of the men at the college. If they did, it might seem as if he, the eminently dignified Doctor Stockton, had considered this a desirable territory in which to bring up five marriageable daughters.

Lucy had an inkling that she was rather pretty and she sometimes used to dream of a time when she could be miles and miles from Gleason with plenty of men, none of them from Gleason, to flirt with.

She was thinking such thoughts to herself one spring evening when she heard some sort of commotion in the street outside. There were voices—street voices, she knew. In the window she could see reflections of red lights—they were carrying torches of some sort. And then quite clearly, right before the house, she heard the shouts:

"Down with Stockton, down with Stockton. We don't want Stockton!" For Lucy it was a terrible ten minutes while the students—the entire student body, it seemed to her—stood there insulting her father in this way. What made the situation more difficult for her was that her father was away. He had suddenly left town that afternoon, telling her that he wished to consult with the chairman of the board of trustees of the college on some urgent matter. He would have to be away from home for four or five days.

Fortunately the housekeeper was deaf and lived at the back of the house. Whatever was done Lucy would have to do alone. And what Lucy did was to go downstairs, snare on the electric light on the front porch and deliberately go out and face the mob of students. The torches they carried glorified the slender, womanly figure there and her face, always pretty, seemed exquisitely beautiful. There was a startling silence. She had no difficulty in making her voice heard. "My father's away," she told them. "I do not know what this all means, but I am glad that he is not here to feel the humiliation that you have made me feel."

There was a stir among them, and then it was that George Harlowe, best looking, straightest limbed young athlete among them, sprang to the veranda. As president of the undergraduate association he took it upon himself to offer some sort of appropriate apology.

"We have gone too far," he said, and cheers from the students assured him that the mob agreed with him. "See here, fellows," he said, leaning over the railing of the porch, the light glorifying his handsome young features too, "shall we apologize to Miss Stockton?"

A deafening chorus of "apologize, apologize," was the answer and then the mob dispersed and George Harlowe and Lucy stood alone. George explained the situation. President Stockton had expelled four of the most popular men and best athletes in the senior class on some very flimsy pretext. So in a mass meeting they had requested the reinstatement of the students. Doctor Stockton had replied by debarring the student officers who had presented the petition from all athletic activities for the remainder of the year. There was another mass meeting and they had passed a resolution to request President Stockton's resignation.

Lucy knew none of the preliminaries, but her father had evidently been sufficiently alarmed to go to consult the president of the board of trustees.

When President Stockton returned the next day the first thing he did was to reinstate the students. His friend, the chairman of the trustees, had advised it. And Lucy held her peace.

That spring she told her father that she was going to marry George. Perhaps President Stockton had heard something of the episode before his house when he was away. At all events he had no protest to make.

Fur-Trimmed Suit Is Popular

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

It is the fur-trimmed short-jacket suit which is holding the center of the stage when it comes to the really distinctive costume for wear about town. The vogue has to do with perfectly stunning types, which are fur-trimmed to the nth degree of luxury.

Some of these midwinter suits are fairly breath-taking in their fur extravagance and animated "lines." This is especially true of the smart and colorful tweeds, the short jackets of which are bordered with showy long-haired fur which stands out about the neckline in a splendidly peplum effect. Quite often the jacket is nipped in at the waistline, thus exaggerating a contour of flaring lines. Add to this a wide and novel collar, also a matching muff and the picture of a perfect midwinter short-jacket suit, as fashion interprets it, is complete.

Contrasting the extreme winter types just described is the suit which is more conservatively fur-trimmed with flat peltry such as astrakhan, geyak, caracul, dried lapin, and only just recently seal has come in for considerable attention as a trimming fur. The costume with lightweight fur has the advantage in one respect, in that it will be wearable not only during the mild winter days, but all through mid-season and on raw, chilly early spring days it will prove timely.

The models illustrated are the sort that will happily bridge over from winter to spring. They are the "classy" type which the smart set will be wearing to luncheon and matinee. The suit to the left is of red woolen material with black caracul edging the collar, cuffs, and the flaring peplum. As to the suit shown to the right, it sounds the fashionable all-black note, in that it is made of a black velvet woolen weave, being also trimmed in black caracul.

It may further be said of the suit that it will be seen everywhere this spring. Not that it will always be strictly a suit version but rather the trend is to jacket costumes, such as accent contrasts between the skirt and vivacious little coiffes.

Oatmeal With Raisins

Cover four tablespoonsful of raisins with rapidly boiling water and let stand long enough for them to swell and soften. Then cut the raisins in halves if they are large. Stir these into left-over oatmeal. As much as two cupsful of the cereal may be used. It is a good plan to have the oatmeal warm when the raisins are added. Moisten small molds or cups with cold water and then pour in the cereal mixture. Chill and serve with a little sugar and cream or rich milk.

Bedtime Story for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

"I'm bright in a way," said the gold watch, "because I am of gold."

"But I will tell you first of all why I have been doing lately—such as to lose and gain time in such a reckless way."

"I was made to look expensive. I cost a lot of money—that is, I cost a good deal of money."

"The one who made me, and the one who had me made were more anxious to have me look well than to have me act well."

"They didn't care what happened to me once I was sold and they sold me for less than they usually would sell a gold watch for because I was so cheaply made inside."

"Of course I looked very expensive and in truth I was very expensive, for I wasn't worth my price and that makes an object most tremendously expensive."

"Well, you see, my works were very poor. I was nervous and not well put together, and so I couldn't go steadily."

"One day I'd feel very fine and I'd go dashing ahead, trying to make up for lost time."

"That, of course, a poor watch can never do. It has never been expected of a watch and so a watch shouldn't try to do it."

"Time goes right on no matter what we may do. But you see I would be so silly."

"I would go ahead so fast that it was as bad as though I had lost time."

"Many were the times when I felt so downhearted that I just dragged the hours away—and lost lots of time."

"The whole trouble was that I was trying to pretend that I was something I wasn't."

"And that never does. If a creature is what it is and isn't trying to be something else, then it is all right."

"I was trying to act like a fine gold watch and I was really a poor gold watch."

"I was a humbug, but it wasn't my fault. It was the fault of the people who made me."

"Anyway I'm here now to be fixed up and I believe I'm to be fixed right so that I'll be what I should be—a good timekeeper."

Use Steam Pressure for Canning Meats

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

The steam pressure canner should always be used for canning meats or chicken, says the United States Department of Agriculture. To be safe, meat must be processed at 250 degrees Fahrenheit. This temperature is higher than boiling water, and is only obtainable under a steam pressure of 15 pounds. Improperly sterilized meats may cause food poisoning.

In choosing a steam pressure canner, see that it is strongly built and that the top clamps on tightly so that there is no leakage of steam when it is closed. There must be an air outlet with a pet cock. The top should be equipped with a pressure gauge, a thermometer, and a safety valve. One serves to check the accuracy of the other. In size, a pressure canner should be suited to the kind of containers to be used and the probable number to be handled at one time. In case the canner must be lifted on and off the stove during canning, it is also important that it should not be too heavy.

After slaughtering, the meat may be prepared for canning as soon as the animal heat has disappeared. The meat is always cooked and seasoned before canning, just as though for immediate serving. It may be roasted, fried, or stewed. It need not be cooked tender, but it should be cooked until the center is no longer red. Remove all bones. Pack the meat while as hot as possible and fill up the jar or can with hot gravy or stock, so that the sterilization period will not be longer than necessary.

Either glass jars or tin cans may be used for canning meats. Full directions for each step in the process will be found in Farmers' Bulletin 1190-F, "Perk on the Farm." Recipes are also given for preparing the various cuts in different ways for canning. The flavor and proportions in these recipes may be varied to suit individual taste, but the length of time and the temperature for the processing of each meat or mixture should never be changed. Other meats are canned similarly after first being cooked in the way desired.

Canned Roast Pork

The ham, shoulder, or loin of pork is best roasted. Scrape the skin clean. Hams will cook more quickly with the skin left on. Wipe the piece of meat with a damp cloth. Sprinkle salt, pepper and flour on the roast. Place it fat side up on a rack in an open pan. Sear quickly in a hot oven, then reduce the temperature and cook slowly, allowing 25 to 30 minutes to the pound. Do not cover and do not add water. When cooked through and nicely browned, slice and pack in cans or jars to within one-half inch of the top of the can. Add gravy made from the pan drippings. There must be at least one-fourth of an inch space between the gravy and the top of the can. Close the can or jar and process in the steam pressure cooker. No. 2 cans or pint jars are processed for 45 to 50 minutes at 250 degrees Fahrenheit or 15 pounds steam pressure. No. 3 cans or quart jars from 55 to 60 minutes at the same pressure. In case the meat is fat the time for processing must be prolonged 10 minutes.

Broccoli Should Not Be Cooked Too Long

Broccoli has come to be regarded as a sort of aristocratic relative of cauliflower, but in its native habitat—Italy and France—it was more democratic, and eaten quite widely. The chief point to watch in cooking it is that it does not become overdone and consequently too soft to lift in whole pieces. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture gives the following method of cooking it:

Trim off and discard the leaves and tough lower portion of the stalks of broccoli. Thoroughly wash the remaining tender stalks with flower heads attached, and cut lengthwise into strips. Drop into lightly salted boiling water, leave the kettle uncovered, and cook for 15 to 25 minutes. As soon as the broccoli is tender and while the color is still fresh green, drain, season with salt and pepper to taste, and add melted butter or other fat, or serve with hollandaise sauce.

How to Remove Spots Without Forming Rings

Removing a Grease Stain With Carbon Tetrachloride.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

One of the commonest of the little accidents that occur at home is getting an unsightly spot on a dress we were counting on wearing. Grease spots, like those made by salad dressing or other food, or by car grease, can be taken out comparatively easily by means of several different fluids, but on some fabrics after cleaning a stain, still larger spot remains where the original damage occurred.

Just why do rings form? They are caused in two ways. The extra dressing in the material often dissolves in the cleaning fluid and backs up to form a ring. The other cause is the spreading of soil by the fluid. Most alkalis, especially the less expensive ones, are heavily dressed in the finishing process of manufacture. This gives them a better feel, better draping qualities, and a greater weight. The materials used in this finishing—the waxes, gums, sugar, dextrine, and glue, are apt to cause rings when the cleaning fluid is applied. They are dissolved, carried back to the edge of the damp portion, and left there as the fabric dries. Another cause of rings is that the stain merely spreads, and is not removed from the fabric. The grease spot or soil already on the garment may just dry in again, as the cleaning fluid evaporates. Often our dresses are slightly soiled even when it does not show. In that case it is usually necessary to dip the entire dress in naphtha or gasoline to remove a spot satisfactorily.

Whether a spot comes out without leaving a ring also depends on the weave and color of the material that has been stained. A ring will not show as plainly on rough and figured fabrics, such as rep or flat crepe, as it does on smooth and plain-colored materials. One cannot hope for great success in getting a spot out of light neutral-colored satin.

"Spots may be taken out of almost any fabric, however, if the cleaning fluid is applied carefully," says an expert in the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture. "Most cleaning fluids, such as chloroform, ether, wood alcohol, gasoline, and carbon tetrachloride, are very good. Of these, carbon tetrachloride is the least likely to form rings. It has additional merit of being noninflammable."

Here's the method of procedure recommended by the bureau: "Place a smooth pad of clean white material under the part of the garment to be cleaned. Next, put clean white blotting paper on the pad and place the garment wrong side up with the stain on the blotting paper, right side next to the blotter. Use a soft rag, and take care not to allow the stained material to become very wet. Always brush lightly from the outside of the spot toward the center and spread the moisture unevenly into the surrounding goods. The secret of the trick is to spread or 'feather' out the liquid into the fabric surrounding the treated section until there is no definite edge when the material dries. This prevents the ring. It is always well to hasten the drying by brushing with a dry rag.

If the grease stain has been caused by a mixture of food materials, not all of which are grease, it is well to brush the spot lightly with a small clean dry brush before beginning to remove the stain. In this way, particles of food may be loosened and brushed off with less chance of dissolving them and spreading the stain.

separately; salt to season and one cupful of whipped cream folded in the last of all. Turn into well oiled molds and set in water. Cook for thirty minutes or until the center is firm. Serve with a white sauce.

Shrimp Supper Dish.—Take one pound of small shrimps, two large slices of bread. Moisten the bread with two cupsful of milk, add a teaspoonful each of onion juice and Worcestershire sauce, three sprigs each of parsley and thyme, one bay leaf, a blade of mace finely chopped, one-fourth of a grated nutmeg and a table-spoonful of butter. Mix well and bake in a casserole; cover with buttered crumbs.

Cream Cheese Pie.—Mix one-half cupful of sugar, one tablespoonful of flour, one-eighth teaspoonful of salt and the grated rind of an orange. Add one and one-half cupsful of cream, add two beaten egg yolks and the stiffly beaten egg whites. Pour into a pastry shell and bake in a slow oven until firm. Serve cold with strawberry jam.

Cheese Leaf.—Take two cupsful of grated cheese, one cupful of bread crumbs, one cupful of mashed potato, two tablespoonfuls of minced parsley, one-eighth teaspoonful of pepper, one-half teaspoonful of salt and two well beaten eggs. Mix the cheese, bread crumbs, potatoes and seasonings. Add the yolks of the eggs and mix well, then fold in the whites of the eggs. Put into a greased bread pan and bake in a hot oven twenty minutes or until firm.

Fruit Cocktail.—Take a can each of apricots and peaches, add one teaspoonful of lemon juice and one table-spoonful of confectioner's sugar. Cut the fruit into cubes and arrange in glasses. Just before serving, after adding some of the fruit juices and more lemon juice, cover with ginger ale.

Lynxless Spaghetti.—Take half a pound of spaghetti, cook until tender in boiling salted water; drain. Chop one onion, one green pepper, one pimiento, add to four tablespoonfuls of bacon fat and cook until the mixture begins to brown. Add the spaghetti and cook until browned. Serve with meat in place of potato.

Sour Cream Spice Cake.—Beat one whole egg and the yolks of two, add three-fourths of a cupful of granulated sugar, three-fourths of a cupful of sour cream in which half a teaspoonful of soda has been dissolved. Stir into the mixture two cupsful of flour which has been sifted with a teaspoonful of baking powder, a teaspoonful of cinnamon, and half a teaspoonful each of mace and clove. Add raisins or nuts and bake in a loaf or in a square cake pan.

There May be Poison in YOUR Bowels!

STEP out tomorrow morning with the fresh buoyancy and briskness that comes from a clean intestinal tract. Syrup Pepsin—a doctor's prescription for the bowels—will help you do this. This compound of fresh laxative herbs, pure pepsin and other pure ingredients will clean you out thoroughly—without griping, sickening or discomfort.

Poisons absorbed into the system form souring waste in the bowels, cause that dull, headachy, sluggish, bilious condition; cut the tongue; foul the breath; sap energy; strength and nerve-force. A little of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin will clear up trouble like that gently, harmlessly, in a hurry. The difference it will make in your feelings over night will prove its merit to you.

Dr. Caldwell studied bowel troubles for forty-seven years. This long experience enabled him to make his prescription just what men, women, old people and children need to make their bowels help themselves. Its natural, mild, thorough action and its pleasant taste commend it to everyone. That's why "Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin," as it is called, is the most popular laxative drug stores sell.

ABOUT BIG BROTHERS

MIMMIE'S brother was devoted to her even though he was eight years older than she was. He used to let her play with him and with his friends a great deal. It had snowed the night before. Mimmie had gone to sleep while the snowstorm had kept up steadily. It was wonderful the way it had kept on while the whole world, almost, had gone to sleep.

The last thing Mimmie had heard was the great fog horn which was just outside the harbor. The bell on the buoy which told ships where the bad rocks were had clanged steadily. For as the buoy tossed about on the waves the bell at the top of the buoy rang. It had been a "blinding" snowstorm, they had said the next day, and the ships along the coast had had a hard time of it. But with the day came sunshine, and when Mimmie awoke she thought for a moment why she felt so very happy. It was really annoying to feel so happy and not know just why. But in a few moments she remembered. It was Saturday and they had planned the night before to build a snow fort if the snow didn't turn into rain during the night. Mimmie got up and shook off some of the snow which had fallen on the big elderdown quilt.

Her sleeping room was at the top of the house and it was very cold. Its windows looked out over the harbor and her bed was near the windows, so that often patches of snow were on the quilt. But she loved it. She loved moving the hot water bottle about so that it warmed the sheets, and sometimes when the water in the bottle had frozen down at the end of the bed, she had had to leave it until she was dressed and it was melted so she could pour it out.

"A GILDED YOUTH"

HERE is an unflattering reference, usually to a young man whose chief ambition lies among the lines of wearing the most fashionable clothes, extracting as much leisure out of life as possible, and with an outlook more or less superficial. This sense is somewhat different from that which the phrase originally enjoyed.

For we have it from the French "Jeune Homme," of which it is a literal translation (gilded youth). At the time of which we are speaking, however, "Jeune Homme" was an allusion to the wealthy and fashionable younger element in France who participated in the overthrow of Robespierre.

THE SCARLET LETTER

ONE day when Nathaniel Hawthorne was discharging his duties as a clerk in the navy docks, he found a mysterious package about which was wrapped a piece of fine red cloth. Upon examination the cloth assumed the shape of the letter "A." Mr. Hawthorne said, "My eyes fastened themselves upon the old scarlet letter and would not be turned away. There was some deep meaning in the mystic symbol; that the letter was not cloth but red hot iron." This explains how the Scarlet Letter happened to be written. "A romance growled in his mind," wrote Mr. Hawthorne. He finished the novel in one year. It was published in 1850, the first edition consisting of five thousand volumes which were exhausted within a week. It is the best known and most widely read of all Mr. Hawthorne's works. The book is a study in the retributive workings of conscience.

According to the laws of the early Puritans, a man who transgressed the marriage law was punished by death. Upon the woman was branded a scarlet letter. It happened upon this occasion that the judges were more lenient with Hester Prynne and permitted her to substitute for the branding the wearing of a scarlet letter of cloth. Arthur Dimmesdale, clerical to the court, was harassed with tortures of an outraged conscience. The day of restitution came. He climbed the pillory and confessed in words that all could hear—"I stand upon the spot where, seven years since I should have stood. Lo, the scarlet letter which Hester wears—but there stood one in the midst of you, at whose infamy ye have not shuddered." With a convulsive motion he tore away his coat, and the scarlet letter which he had worn in secret was revealed. Thus did conscience take its toll.

LAMBS FATTENED ON SMALL GRAIN

Wheat, Barley, Oats and Rye Worth Trying.

Grain prices are so abnormal now that lamb feeders must give unusual attention to the grain market in order to reduce the cost of feeding operations, says E. H. Morrison, head of the animal husbandry department of the college of agriculture at Cornell. Wheat has been selling on the Chicago market decidedly below corn, a condition which would not have been considered possible a year ago. Oats and barley are cheaper than corn, and rye is still lower in price.

This raises the question, adds Professor Morrison, as to the relative values of various grains for lamb feeding. In three experiments at the Michigan and the South Dakota experiment stations several years ago lambs fed wheat and hay made just as rapid gains as others fed shelled corn and wheat. The wheat-fed lambs required only 2 per cent more feed for each 100 pounds of gain than did those fed corn.

In four other experiments, wheat was compared with barley for lamb feeding and it proved to be worth slightly more than barley. British experiments likewise show that wheat is worth slightly more than barley, ton for ton, for fattening lambs, and that it is nearly equal to corn.

For cattle and swine, wheat should be rolled or ground, but sheep can usually grind their own wheat. With very hard wheat, it may be more economical to grind the grain, even for sheep. Otherwise, some will not be properly cleaned.

Many tests prove that lambs fed barley make practically as rapid gains as those fed wheat, but that they require slightly more feed for each 100 pounds of gain. Considering all the facts available, it may be concluded that barley is worth from 15 to 20 per cent less a ton for lambs than is shelled corn. It is not necessary to grind ordinary barley for sheep.

Oats are well liked by sheep and are excellent for the breeding flock. The grain is also one of the best feeds to mix with the heavier grains, such as corn, in starting lambs or sheep on fattening feeds.

Oats are bulky, however, and high in fiber and not especially suited to be the chief grain for fattening animals. Hence, when oats are used in starting lambs on feed, says Professor Morrison, the proportion is gradually decreased, and the oats are usually omitted entirely after the lambs are on full feed.

Small Flock Owners Urged to Keep Sheep

Farmers of the state who have small flocks of sheep should not become discouraged by the temporary slump in lamb and wool prices, says Dr. W. L. Caver, extension economist of the University of Minnesota. He predicts that prices for sheep products are now close to the bottom of the cycle and that those who hang on to their present flocks will find them profitable over a period of years.

Doctor Caver says that prices of both lambs and wool have been hard hit by the industrial depression as well as by the large supply. Since 1923 the United States as a whole has increased its sheep by 30 per cent. During the same time there has been a 100 per cent gain in Minnesota with approximately 400,000 head now as compared with 400,000 in 1923.

Many Minnesota flocks have been started in recent years and are a minor part of the farm business. Minnesota farmers, therefore, are in better position to maintain their flocks than are those in sections where sheep are a major enterprise. Doctor Caver recommends that farmers having plenty of feed might even find it profitable to begin a moderate expansion of their sheep enterprise now.

Feed and Management of Boar for Profits

There is a saying as old as the industry that "The boar is more than half the herd" and yet in many cases the feed and management of the boar are given the least consideration of any phase of pork production. Very frequently the boar is confined in a small pen with little chance for exercise, but exercise is an important factor in keeping the boar in vigorous, healthy, breeding condition. Satisfactory shelter should also be provided. Shelter need not be elaborate but it should give protection against unfavorable weather conditions.

Bad for Pigs

Winter housing conditions and winter rations or dry lot feeding at best are not ideal for young pigs. They not only need the best of feed—protein that stimulates growth—but also vitamins and minerals that stimulate growth. The late fall pig that goes into winter quarters populated with internal and external parasites, or the organism that cause necrosis in one or more of the forms, has little prospect of making any money for its owner.

L. L. C.

The Ladies Literary Club held its first meeting of 1931 at the home of Mrs. Mae Miser, Wednesday night, January 6. There was only a very short business session before the program.

Undoubtedly the latter was one of the outstanding of the year. The topic, "Culinary Art," was instructive and entertaining not only because of its peculiar interest to women but also because of its artful presentation by the Misses Helen Ditmars and Cleota Morr.

Modern fashions in table linens, silver, glassware and pewter, as well as correct and beautiful arrangements of these on the table were discussed. Many of the reminders of table etiquette that were so tactfully given caused some smiles, probably because it is not always easy to follow all the rules in our every day hurry and bustle.

To prove that the authors of the program could practice what they had been preaching a buffet supper, correct in every detail, was served to all the members present. The food consisting of shrimp creamed with hard boiled eggs in pastry shells, perfection salad, stuffed celery and olives, rolls, desert and coffee had been prepared by Miss Morr and Miss Ditmars.

Surely no one ever learned the proper ways of doing a thing in a more pleasant manner. Unfortunately there was no grading of the club women to know whether they practiced the rules of etiquette of which they had been told during the earlier part of the evening.

FALL COLDS

(By J. H. Bodwell)

A stitch in time saves nine is an old adage. It is particularly applicable to the poultry keeper. Poultry diseases are more prevalent in these days of large flocks under confinement than heretofore when only small flocks were kept that wandered at will over large acres.

Diseases at this time of year have put more poultrymen out of the game than any other single thing. It is up to every poultryman to keep ahead of diseases by using every possible means at his disposal. Such common diseases as fall colds, bronchitis, roup, canood condition. The same reason—avoided if proper precautions are taken at this season of the year. As it is, at housing time or shortly after that that these diseases get their start and after they are started production slows up or stops altogether and the poultry keeper loses his profits for the year.

Ventilation is of great help in controlling or preventing these diseases. Where proper ventilation is maintained, drafts and wet floors are practically eliminated. Drafts and wet floors give any disease a chance to get started and develop rapidly.

Next to ventilation, sanitation is of vital importance. The medical profession acknowledges the fact that humans if constipated catch colds and other diseases quicker than if the bowels are in order and chicken pox can almost be applied to poultry. Plenty of green feed will keep the hen in condition which helps eliminate many of the diseases.

Alfalfa cured in the sun, fed alone or when mixed with molasses, is probably one of the green feeds many poultrymen have neglected, but those that are using it find that the birds are getting more mineral matter and vitamins and the birds are in better condition to make more money for their owners.

Be sure to see that your hen houses are properly ventilated and that the birds are getting plenty of green feed during this time of year.

NOT JUST A BEVERAGE

A by-product of milk helps to make fountain pens, buttons, glue, billiard balls, and the glazed surfaces of paper and cardboard. This commodity, casein, represents only three per cent of milk content, but its uses as related by the Bureau of Dairy Industry, are manifold. To the coated paper and the glue manufacturers, it is indispensable, since approximately 75 per cent of all casein is consumed in these two industries. During the war, the government used 13,000,000 pounds of casein as glue in the construction of airplanes.

This offspring of the dairy industry is sometimes used in making paint, as an insecticide spray base, as a filler for certain cloths, in the processing of leather, linoleum articles, and other commodities where adhesive and waterproof qualities are needed. Edible casein is produced on a small scale and used as a base for medicines in powdered form.

About 60,000,000 pounds of casein are consumed annually in the United States. They are produced from 22,000,000,000 pounds of skimmed milk which otherwise would be wasted or fed to farm animals.

Wise Old Coyote Takes

Few Chances on Traps
Ordinarily the coyote does not band like the timber wolf. The person unacquainted with coyotes and their habits would hardly believe the above statement after listening for the first time to the howling of one or two of these animals.

The coyote can make more noise for his size than any animal in the woods and a solitary male can go change the volume and direction of his voice that one would almost swear there were a dozen coyotes doing his stuff.

If a coyote locates dead game and is afraid to run chances of getting his toes pinched he will, provided he is a wise old beast, employ a simple strategy to test the danger of the place. Setting back on his haunches he will send a few well-rounded calls into the air, a sort of hunting cry which signals for help. The nearest coyote, particularly if it be a young and uninitiated fellow, will answer the call and come post haste.

While the wise one holds back the newcomer will walk and investigate. Presently, providing nothing serious happens, the old one will come on in and partake of the feast. But, as sometimes happens, if the youngster steps into a steel trap, the other unconsciously takes his leave, another sly wrinkle of wisdom forming on his shrewd face as he steals cautiously away.

Two-Dollar Bill Called
"Just Darned Nuisance"

The idea that there is something unlucky about the $2 bill—so that many persons tear the corners off to avert misfortune—occasionally arouses curiosity.

A number of our readers have written in with suggestions to account for the belief in the unluckiness of this particular note. One, however, a merchant in Pennsylvania, says from his experience as a retailer that "there is no question of superstition in connection with the $2 bill. It is just a darned nuisance."

"There is no compartment provided in our cash register for them," he writes, "and when we are handed one by a customer we have to secrete it away somewhere until we get a chance to pass it on to another customer for change, that is if we want to retain their good will."

"The only possible use it has is when some one purchases a 2-cent stamp and hands us a $2 bill in payment. Then we can get back at him by unloading all the $2 bills we have on hand."—Literary Digest.

Circumstantial Evidence

By MARY CAREY

THEY had been married six months to the very day. Sally wasn't sentimental about anniversaries; she didn't expect candy or flowers; she wasn't even very much disappointed when Phil forgot the date entirely—but to have him choose that particular evening to talk to her so dreadfully, and in front of all their friends, was really too much!

"Ye Gods!" Phil had said. "Haven't you even brains enough to return a compliment? If you can't learn to play bridge, why not admit it and quit?" Well, she had quit; she'd left not only the bridge party but Phil himself several miles behind. Sally gave a vicious push to the accelerator of her blue roadster and swung on two wheels round the corner into Park drive.

Early the next morning, Miss Georgia Smith, starting on her daily trip to the meat market for Tootles' chop bones, paused before the closed door of an apartment on the floor below her own. Usually at this hour a burst of singing and the clatter of dishes announced to passersby that the "pretty little red-haired bride" was on the job. Today the apartment was disturbingly silent.

"Not that I'm curious," she was soon explaining to plump Mrs. Walton at the corner grocery. "You know I never pry into other people's affairs—but it did seem very queer to me, very queer indeed. I went around to the courtyard and looked up and every window was shut tight. And there was this peculiar odor. It somehow suggested a hospital to me, but it wasn't ether."

"That's it. Yes, I'm sure that was it. Don't burglars use chloroform?" "Yes, they do. Or sometimes people kill themselves. But you say they seemed quite happy?"

"Oh, very happy! Just bride and groom, you know. And she was such a pretty little thing, with lovely red hair. Oh, dear, what do you think I'd better do?"

"Do? Well, of course your janitor would have a pass-key, but I don't really believe . . . Oh my goodness, there's the trolley coming!"

Decidedly out of breath, Mrs. Walton sank into the seat nearest the trolley door and discovered its other occupant to be a friend of her young sister's. They fell into casual conversation, to which the older woman, after a time, contributed the story she had just heard.

"The Waverly Court Apartment," Lorna exclaimed. "Yes—I know where they are. I'll be looking for details in the paper. So long."

Philip Armstrong looked up from his desk, annoyed by the chatter of the filing clerks inside the next partition. He half rose from his chair to ask for quiet, overheard some one say "The Waverly Court Apartments" and sank back to listen.

"Go on, Lorna. It's like hearing a newspaper story before it comes out."

"Only I don't know the end. Any way this young couple had been living there for about six months, and they seemed crazy about each other. She said—what doesn't sound like suicide. But all the doors and windows were shut tight and stuffed round the edges with rags, and burrowing the edges wouldn't do that. Then there was this terrible smell of chloroform, simply overpowering, and no answer to all their pounding on the door."

"My heavens, girls—what ails Mr. Armstrong? He's been acting queer all morning and now he's dashed off without his coat or hat."

At almost the same moment, in a downtown tea room, a plump matron suddenly exclaimed to her bosom friend: "My dear, do look at that girl. Tearing out as though the place was on fire."

"She was listening to you," remarked the even plumper friend, placidly sipping a fruited chocolate, "and when you said 'Waverly Court Apartments' she just jumped out of her chair."

So it happened that Philip Armstrong and his very new and very red-headed wife fell into each other's arms at the door of a certain much-talked-of apartment.

"Oh darling darling—I was a brute!" "Dearest—I was a perfect little fool. I drove out to Mother's for the night, of course."

Suddenly they realized that the door of their apartment stood open and that from within there came forth a faint but decidedly anesthetic odor and the sound of voices. In the kitchen they found Miss Sneath and the janitor, sniffing at a large wooden crate.

"What's in it?" demanded Miss Sneath. "Gingerines!" chorused the Armstrongs.

"They're spilling on the bottom, mum," announced the janitor, after another sniff. "And I'm not saying they don't smell mighty like this here chloroform Miss Georgia was a-bout in."

"I suppose I should apologize," began Miss Sneath, beligerently. "Oh, please don't," cried Sally. "Indeed we're most grateful to you," added Phil. "Won't you please have some oranges?"

Historic Buildings in

City of Philadelphia

Its wealth of historical landmarks and associations and its close proximity with other cities and places of interest on the east coast places Philadelphia on the main roadway of eastern tourist travel. To the visitor interested in the nation's history this city offers associations which are identified with it alone and which distinguish it among all other American towns. Chief among these is Independence Hall, where the Liberty bell reposes and within whose walls the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States were drawn and signed.

Many of the most interesting old landmarks are confined to a small area on the central part of town, among these being Carpenter's hall, meeting place of the first Continental congress; the Betsy Ross house, where the first American flag is said to have been made and old Christ church, place of worship of Revolutionary heroes and in whose graveyard lies the body of Benjamin Franklin. Congress hall is another point of interest.

All About the Banana

Japanese descriptions are almost always good for a few laughs. One of the latest is the theme of a little Japanese schoolboy in the Sacramento valley. The subject was "The Banana," and the little fellow wrote:

"The banana are great remarkable fruit. He are constructed in the same architectural style as the honorable sausage. Difference being skin of sausage are habitually consumed while it is not advisable to eat rapping of banana."

"Banana are held aloft while consuming; sausage are usually left in reclining position. Sausage depend for creation on human being or stuffing machine while banana are pristine product of honorable mother nature."

"In case of sausage both conclusions are attached to other sausages; honorable banana on other hand are joined on one end to the stem and opposite termination are entirely loose."

"Finally, banana are strictly member of vegetable kingdom while affiliation of sausage is often undecided."—Los Angeles Times.

Alaska in Summer

The Alaskan summer is one of gorgeous, vivid sun, warm winds and flower gardens. The warm Japan current, striking Vancouver island, is deflected northward and carries to the Alaskan coast the same delightful humidity of the lower Pacific coast. To the visitor Alaska becomes a land of great forests, rushing rivers, Indians, curious totem poles, black fox farms, salmon fisheries. The journey there through 1,000 miles of scenery such as found nowhere else is made in four days threading the almost land-locked channel known as the "Inside Passage" which winds through mountain-homed fjord-like waterways as through a fairyland with wooded islands, tremendous glacier peaks, fascinating Alaskan towns and queer old settlements.

Ponderous Doctor Johnson

That Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709-1784), famous English lexicographer, defined a window as "an office in an edifice," in his noted dictionary is a fact which lends point to the popular anecdote told by Boswell. Speaking of him, Boswell said he thought it would be difficult to write such fanciful things. Johnson said it would be easy enough.

In a later comment on this incident, Boswell recalled the fable of the little fishes who saw birds flying over their heads. The biographer remarked: "The skill consisted in making them talk like little fishes, but if Doctor Johnson were to make little fishes talk, they would talk like whales!"

Safety First

During the trial of a man on a serious charge of theft the evidence was so palpably insufficient that the judge stopped the case and directed the jury to return a verdict of "not guilty." A well-known lawyer, however, who wished to do something for the fee he had received for the defense, claimed the privilege of addressing the court.

"We'll hear you with the greatest pleasure," said the judge, "but to prevent accident, we'll first acquit the prisoner!"—Montreal Star.

Didn't Need Any

Mary Jane's mother was in the back yard so she went to the door when a young man knocked.

"Please tell your mother I have a subpoena for her," said the man. "I'm sorry," said Mary Jane, "but mother just went to the grocery store and she'll be back in a few minutes."

It was Freddie's first visit to the country.

During a walk with his grandfather in the woods he kept looking round as if expecting to see some one.

"Why are you looking round?" asked the old gentleman.

"Where's the policeman?" asked Freddie.

"Policeman?" cried the other. "We have no policeman in the country, Freddie."

The boy looked more puzzled than before.

"Then who keeps the people off the grass?" he answered.

Doris Jay in a Dust Cap

By JANE OSBORN

(Copyright.)

AT GRAYSON'S typists came and typists went but Impeccable Miss Hanson went on forever. Just a few days ago Doris Jay was the typist who had most recently arrived and who, it seemed to Miss Hanson, ought to be the next to leave.

"A nice, neat, pleasant sort of girl," Miss Hanson was telling Mr. Michael Grayson in a condescending sort of way—conceding not, of course, toward Mr. Grayson but toward the girl in question. "But she simply won't do. She isn't the type—she doesn't belong—and besides she can't manage her typewriter."

"Oh, well, all right," snapped Michael Grayson, who sometimes wondered of the efficient methods of his stenographer who was ten years his senior and had a way of treating him like a nephew.

Obviously Miss Hanson had some special prejudice against Miss Jay. But they decided not to tell her of her fate until pay day. Then they would give her a week's salary and tell her not to come back. That was the system at Grayson's.

Neither he nor Miss Hanson saw her that evening go down the hall to the stockroom where she sought and found Larry, the shipping clerk and office opener. "You know you promised me a key to the office," she whispered to him. "Don't say anything to anyone, Larry. It's all right. You know you promised—" and with a little coaxing Miss Doris Jay was going her way the cheerful possessor of the key.

Then as Miss Hanson went out she stopped to see Larry. She asked him about a girl he knew who might want a job. "We're letting Miss Jay go tomorrow."

"Miss Jay," exclaimed Larry. "I don't believe she knows it—well, of course, I haven't anything to say about it."

"Of course, you haven't, Larry," agreed Miss Hanson acidly. "This Miss Jay isn't the sort of girl we usually employ here. I hope you understand."

Larry didn't understand in the least. Miss Jay was neat, trim and good to look upon but not in the least what Larry would call "flashy." Perhaps her work hadn't been up to the mark but she had only been there two weeks. Larry went home and continued to worry about the key until seven that night. Then he suddenly called up Mr. Michael Grayson at his home and told his employer of the key.

Michael Grayson said that there could be no harm in giving the key to the girl, who doubtless had some work she wanted to do before opening hour in the morning. Then he got to thinking about it. Miss Hanson had said that the girl "didn't belong." Michael hadn't had the most remote idea of what she meant by that, but perhaps she really had some suspicions of the girl.

Michael let himself into the outer office. "Hello," he called out, "anyone around?" Then there in his own office and with the door open between it and the outer office—he saw Doris. It was Doris Jay's surely—but Doris in a dust cap. She wore an enormous apron hanging longer than her trim little frock, and when he first saw her there she was on her knees applying what appeared to be furniture oil to the end of his desk.

"Oh, I never thought you'd come," she cried. "I was just trying to clean things up here a little. I heard you say that it annoyed you because the cleaning woman never really cleaned your office, and it drives me nuts—cray—the dust and everything. So I just made up my mind to come back. I brought some soap and some cloths and some furniture polish and I found an old pail in here—and, well, I'm getting things so they took a little better."

Michael was standing there smiling with boundless pleasure and admiration.

Doris went on: "Maybe I'm a poor typist—Miss Hanson told me I was of no use in an office—but I just made up my mind that I'd try to do a little to earn my salary. And I knew you said the dust annoyed you, too."

Michael begged her to stop, assuring her that he didn't want her to do such hard work and that he was afraid she would mar her nice hands. But Doris refused to quit.

"I'll stick around here then," he said, "until you are through. And then I want to take you some place nice to have something to eat. I can go off without half finishing my dinner, and I'll bet you did, too."

The next day he gave Miss Hanson orders—quite drastic orders, too—to do nothing about discharging Miss Jay. Miss Hanson sulked and did as she was told. A week later he told her to take Miss Jay's name off the payroll.

"I thought you'd come to your senses," smiled the able stenographer. "I knew you'd want her to leave."

"I certainly do," said Michael. "But not for the reason you think. I'm going to marry Doris Jay and I'd rather not have the girl I'm engaged to working in my office."

C. W. HANNA
EXPERIENCES HOLDUP

About three o'clock Saturday morning, a car drove up to the C. W. Hanna residence, a man alighted from a Pontiac Coupe driven by a woman and proceeded to awaken Mr. Hanna. He partly dressed and came to the door to find out what was wanted, and when he stepped to the door, the bandit proceeded to cover him with a gun and without a word, searched Mr. Hanna's pockets and released him of $41.00 in bills.

Before Mr. Hanna opened the door the visitor stated that he was out of gasoline and wished to get filled up, but later Mr. Hanna discovered that he misunderstood the visitor, it was money he was after instead of gas.

Backing off the porch, he gave warning that no sound should be made before his escape, and when the robber reached the terrace he slipped and fell onto the walk, scrambling up he jumped onto the running board of the car and they were off.

No description of the bandit or woman driver could be given, as the bandit was masked, and besides the fright was sufficient to make any one lose his memory. There is one thing evident and that is that the bandit surely knew Mr. Hanna or he would not have asked for gas.

Mr. Hanna stated that he is frequently called out at night to fill up cars with gas, and did not think anything out of the ordinary, although the fellow had his cap pulled down when he opened the door.

VICTOR MCCRORY
RECEIVES APPOINTMENT

(Special to the News)
Washington, January 21.—Congressman David Hogg today announced his nomination of eight boys in the Twelfth District to take the entrance examination for the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis in the near future.

There are four boys from each Congressional District in the United States in training at the Naval Academy. From the 12th District there are now Jack White, Fort Wayne; George Franklin Schultz, of Columbia City; Frank L. Parker, Butler; and Paul F. Pfingstag, of Hudson.

Schultz and White will both graduate in June this year and two of the candidates, named by Congressman Hogg will take their places entering with the new class in July.

The following boys were named by Hogg: Frank B. Plummer, Jr., of Wolkottville; Robert Spicer, Jr., of Fort Wayne; Victor E. McCrory, of Spencerville; Francis Gardner, Fort Wayne; Ciles Frank Zwalen, Fort Wayne; Lewis Frederick Williamson, Angola; Melvin Williamson, Kimmell; and Philip Palmer, Fort Wayne.

SUNDAY EVENING SMASH UP

Two young bloods from Fort Wayne found themselves in the ditch with a Ford Roadster on top of them, at the Widney Corners east of town Sunday evening. They were coming from the north and for some reason were unable to make the corner west toward town so they drove on south and run off the grade.

One of the boys gave his name as Flag, and he crawled out, but was compelled to call for help to release his partner, Chas. Helling, with the aid of J. H. Leighty, got the car square away and J. N. Scholes came along and delivered the boys to town. Hanna's garage man repaired the car so they were able to go on to Fort Wayne Monday morning.

They had been drinking and this has been attributed to the cause of the smash up.

RESULT OF THE COUNTY TOURNEY

In the county high school basketball tournament at Ashley Saturday some thing unusual occurred in the experience of basketball players.

Waterloo and Ashley were tied 19 to 19 at the end of the game. Three 5-minute overtime periods were played and the score was still at 19. As a final recourse a coin was flipped and Waterloo won the toss.

Spencerville defeated St. Joe 17 to 10 and Butler downed Garrett in the second game of the morning 29 to 19.

Butler defeated Spencerville 30 to 8 in the county tourney leaving Waterloo and Butler to play off the finals.

In the finals Butler beat Waterloo 22 to 16.

OBITUARY

Mrs. Virginia Lawson, widow of Charles A. Lawson, who passed away last Friday at her home in St. Joe, Indiana, was a former resident of Reynolds and funeral services were held from the Christian Church in Reynolds Monday afternoon at one o'clock with Rev. Al-drick of Butler, officiating, assisted by Rev. Paul Ewing of Wolcott.

The music was furnished by a choir from Wolcott. Interment was made in the Lane cemetery. The following brief sketch of her life was read at the service: Virginia John, daughter of Ira and Adeliza John, was born at Lafayette, May 21, 1847 and departed this life January 9, 1931 at the age of 83 years, 7 months and 18 days. She was married to Chas. A. Lawson November 24, 1870 and he preceded her in death October 5, 1914.

To this union were born four children, Walter R. Lawson of Logansport; Chas. B. of St. Joe; Mrs. Hugh Langwell of Bloomington and Mrs. Harvey Lindley of St. Joe, all surviving her. She also leaves nine grandchildren and three great grandchildren.

She confessed Christ at the early age of 12 years and continued steadfast in her faith being identified with the Church of Christ. She was a diligent student of the Bible and was always at her place of worship until her age and affliction prevented.

Mrs. Lawson was a charter member of and helped organize the Christian church at Reynolds. She was a teacher of the Woman's Bible Class as long as she lived in the community, more than twenty years.

Relatives attending from a distance were Mr. and Mrs. Walter R. Lawson of Logansport, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Lawson, Mr. and Mrs. Harvey J. Lindley, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Lindley and daughter and Mr. and Mrs. Cecil Likes, all of St. Joe and Mrs. Hugh Langwell of Bloomington.

CARD OF THANKS

We wish to express our thanks to the members of the church and community for their sympathy and help during our recent bereavement in the loss of our mother, Mrs. Virginia Lawson, also for the music and beautiful floral offerings.

OBITUARY

Carrie Mae, daughter of Daniel and Sarah Bodiker was born in Clark County, Ohio, November 22, 1875, departed this life January 15, 1931, aged 55 years, 1 month and 23 days.

In 1895 her parents moved to Newville, DeKalb County, Indiana. Upon the death of her mother, in 1902, she made her home with her brother, Daniel, with whom she continued to reside until called to her eternal home.

At the age of five years, Carrie sustained a fall crippling her for life, causing her much physical pain and suffering. Bravely and patiently she carried her burden through life, while loving hearts tenderly ministered unto her and sought to share her burdens.

In 1910, under the ministry of Fred A. Thomas, she was baptized into Christ, at Newville, and was ever a devoted member of His church, gladly rendering any service that she was called to render.

Of near relatives Carrie leaves but one brother, Daniel Bodiker of Newville, Indiana, who has been both a brother and a father to her all these years. Other relatives, however, and many, many friends are and today because of her departure.

Funeral services were held Sunday afternoon at 1 o'clock from the Church of Christ at Newville, with Rev. Fred Thomas officiating. Burial was made in Hicksville cemetery, Richard Rupp, funeral director.

FRANK MEESE DRAWS SUSPENDED SENTENCE

(Evening Star)
Upon a plea of guilty to assault and battery, Frank Meese of St. Joe, was fined $5 and costs and was given a suspended penal farm sentence of six months by Judge Endicott Thursday afternoon.

Meese was placed under arrest Wednesday on complaint of his wife, Mrs. Queen Meese, who said her husband while drunk beat her and severely injured her arm. Meese told the judge he did not attack his wife, but was only trying to defend himself from her.

The court was informed that Meese has been helping to care for his aged father, who is an invalid, and for that reason the sentence was suspended. However, Meese was warned to remain sober and peaceable in the future.

Russel R. Ridenour appeared as attorney for the defendant and R. W. Sharpless, prosecuting attorney, represented the state.

Sues for a Divorce

An action for a divorce was filed in the DeKalb circuit court Saturday afternoon by Queen Meese of St. Joe against Frank Meese.

Married June 23, 1920, the couple separated Friday. Mrs. Meese states that her husband frequently became intoxicated and on numerous occasions struck and beat her. Last Wednesday, she states, he broke her arm while abusing her. She alleges also that altho he is capable of earning $100 a month he refused to work and he would not provide a proper home for her.

Mrs. Meese demands $500 alimony. She is also asking for an order for her support pending the trial of the cause and for her attorney's fees. She is represented by Richard W. Sharpless.

Holding a Husband

How to keep a husband, in nine chapters, is told by the California Federation of Women's Clubs. Here are the rules: Dress prettily for breakfast. Get your husband to take you out two evenings a week, but let him stay at home the rest. Pay the household bills before buying new dresses. Never make your husband dry dishes. Never permit your mother-in-law to visit on holidays. Listen to your husband if he likes the sound of his voice. Ask his advice on everything. Be clinging, but not too clinging. Make him think you're a weak, small creature and he is 9 feet tall with the strength of a lion.

THE EDITOR feels sure that if he asked the small children of this community what to put in his paper which would interest them most, they would say "Stories!" So he is doing that very thing.

They are interesting stories; they are stories which tell the children something useful as well as entertain them. For they are the stories of Mary Graham Bonner, the best-known writer of children's stories in America today, and they are appearing regularly in this paper because the editor wants to make it a newspaper for every member of the family, young as well as old. Read them to your children and have them tell their play-mates about these stories.

GARRETT GIRLS DEFEATED LOCALS

The Yankee Clippers defeated the St. Joe girls' basketball team Friday night on the St. Joe court by a score of 42 to 13.

Roser made a true shot in the first few seconds of play. St. Joe followed with a basket and then Alford hit the net and the Garrett sharpshooters piled the score up the rest of the half which ended 19 to 6.

In the last period of play the Clippers took charge of the ball and scored time and time again, while the Garrett guards held the St. Joe girls to 7 points.

Moonlight at the Poles

The Naval observatory says that at either pole the moon is above the horizon continuously for about two weeks, and then below the horizon continuously for about two weeks. At the Arctic and Antarctic circles there are some years when for a few days in each month the moon does not set, and a few days when it does not rise; otherwise at these circles it rises and sets daily. In the polar regions, during the winter months, the moon is generally above the horizon when it is full and below the horizon when it is new, and the reverse is the case during the summer months.

GARRETT LADIES
CELEBRATE BIRTHDAYS

About twenty-five relatives gathered at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Brown, Garrett, Ind., last Friday to celebrate the forty-fourth birthday of Mrs. Brown and the seventy-seventh birthday of her mother, Mrs. John Geisinger. An elaborate pot luck dinner was served at noon, followed by singing.

Those present were Mr. and Mrs. Frank Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Reuben Koch, Mrs. Chas. Koch and Mrs. Clay Coburn of St. Joe, Mr. and Mrs. Al Geisinger of Garrett, Dr. Geisinger of Auburn, Mrs. J. W. Morr, Mrs. Edward Tipton and son, John Hugh and Miss Tanner of Albion, Mrs. Anna Baker and Mrs. Claud Mason of Fort Wayne and the honor guests. At a late hour the guests left for their homes wishing the ladies many more birthdays.

JESUS TEMPTED

LESSON TEXT—Luke 4:1-13.
GOLDEN TEXT—For in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus True to God.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus True to God.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—How to Overcome Temptation.
YOUNG PEOPLE'S AND ADULT TOPIC—Conflicting Ideals.

I. The Place (v. 1).

The wilderness of Judea. The first man, Adam, was tempted in a garden with the most pleasant surroundings. The second man, Jesus Christ, was tempted in a barren wilderness, surrounded by wild beasts (Mark 1:13). Adam shamefully failed, involving the whole race in ruin (Rom. 5:12); Christ gloriously triumphed, bringing justification of life as a free gift upon all who believe (Rom. 5:18).

II. The Purpose (v. 1).

Christ was led into the wilderness by the Holy Spirit. His temptation was Messianic. Men today are not tempted as he was, but the same methods are employed by the Evil One. The time had come for the Redeemer to enter upon his mediatorial work. Therefore, he went from the place of anointing and heavenly recognition as the Son of God to meet and to spoil the enemy of God and men (Heb. 2:14).

1. It was not a preparation for his work but rather his first conflict with the enemy. If his baptism we have the symbolic act of the dedication of himself to the work of redemption through the work of the cross.

2. It was not to see if Christ would stand fast, as whether he would fall under the mesmeric test. Being the eternal Son of God, incorporated with the perfect humanity, sin and failure were impossible.

3. It was to exhibit Christ as an object upon which we may rest our faith with unshaken confidence. He came as the second man, the head of a new race, the very source of its life. The temptations, therefore, a demonstration of the inseparableness of the divine and human natures in the incarnation.

III. The Method (vv. 2-12).

Christ as the world's Redeemer sustained a threefold relation—Son of Man, Son of God, and Messiah. Therefore, Satan made each one a ground of attack.

1. As Son of Man (vv. 2-4). Satan made his first assault upon him as a man by appealing to the instinct of hunger. Satan urged him to use his divine power to convert a stone into bread. The temptation was in satisfying a right hunger in a wrong way. To have yielded in this case though his hunger was desperate would have been to renounce the human limitations which he had taken for our sakes. To do right in a wrong way is to sin.

2. As Messiah (vv. 5-8). Here the temptation was to grasp his rightful dominions by false means. The Devil offered to surrender unto him the world if he would adore his methods, would worship him. The force of this temptation was in the fact that the kingdoms of the world are Christ's by God's covenant with him. Satan has forfeited his right to rule God's method by which Jesus was to possess the world was his sacrificial death on the cross.

3. As the Son of God (vv. 9-12). Here Satan tried to induce Christ to presume upon God's care. He quoted a Messianic psalm to induce him to so act. To do the spectacular thing in order to get notice is to fall into Satan's temptation. For Jesus to have placed himself in danger in order to get God's special help in delivering him would have been to sin. To test God as to whether he will keep his promise is the greatest distrust.

IV. Christ's Defense (vv. 4, 8, 12). It was the Word of God. He met and repulsed the enemy with "it is written." In the most crucial hour of the world's history Christ quoted from the Book of Deuteronomy, which the rationalists of the day reject as not being fully inspired.

V. The Issue (v. 13).

Satan was vanquished. He could not stand against God's Word.

Let the Light Shine

Christian, rest not until thou knowest the full, the unbroken shining of God in thy heart! To this end, yield to every stirring of it that shows thee some unconquered and perhaps unconquerable evil! Let the light shine upon it, and shine it out!—Andrew Murray.

Enmity With God

Friendship of the world is enmity with God, because the leadership of the world is directly against godliness; and for this reason it is out of the question for any child of God to forsake the ways of godliness and conform to the sinful ways of the world.—Doctrines of the Bible.

The Empty Cup

Do not let the empty cup be the first teacher of the blessings you had when it was full.—Maclaren.

REMEMBER TO TAKE HOME SOME LAUNDRY SOAP

BE SURE TO GET RINSO—IT WASHES CLOTHES MUCH WHITER

"I never saw such soapy suds" she tells friend

DON'T experiment with other soaps. You can be sure about Rinsol. It gets clothes snowy-white, just by soaking. You don't have to scrub or boil. How that saves the clothes! "Rinsol is all I ever use on washday—no other soap—no softener. It's very economical."

A real thrift-soap

Cup for cup, Rinsol gives twice as much suds as light-weight, puffed-up soaps. Rich, lasting suds—even in hard water.

And these active suds are safe for your choicest linens. The makers of 38 washers recommend Rinsol.

Get the BIG package. Wonderful for dishes, too.

MILLIONS USE RINSO in tub, washer and dishpan

Mail Speeds Compared

In recent tests of speed in the transmission of messages the Navy department found that it took a message 4 days and 30 minutes to reach San Francisco from Washington via ordinary mail, 3 days and 30 minutes via air mail, 14 to 21 minutes by commercial telegraph lines, and only 4 minutes by naval radio.

Ease in 5 Minutes—Comfort in 6 Hours

Don't let SORE THROAT get the best of you...

FIVE minutes after you rub on Musterole your throat should begin to feel less sore! Continue the treatment once every hour for five hours and you'll be astonished at the relief.

This famous blend of oil of mustard, camphor, menthol and other ingredients brings relief naturally. Musterole gets action because it is a "counter-irritant"—not just a salve—it penetrates and stimulates blood circulation and helps to draw out infection and pain. Used by millions for 20 years. Recommended by doctors and nurses.

Keep Musterole handy—jars and tubes. To Mothers—Musterole is also made in milder form for babies and small children. Ask for Children's Musterole.

THE STORY

Returning to London, practically penniless, after an unsuccessful business trip, Sir George Sanderson takes dinner with his widowed stepmother, his old nurse, "Aggy." He did not approve of her marriage to his father, but her explanation satisfies him. Little is left of the estate, and Lady Sanderson proposes that they go to the United States to visit her brother, Robert MacBeth, wealthy contractor. Sir George agrees. MacBeth lives on an island estate with his daughter, Roberta, who longs for city life. MacBeth is a victim of arthritis and almost helpless. MacBeth is glad to see his sister and asks the two to stay.

CHAPTER III—Continued

It was Roberta who had selected Indian Lodge and had used her father's name when she telephoned and arranged for luncheon. Juan had, obligingly in the modern manner, left it all to her. Juan, who had angelized his first name, and was known as "Jack" Navarro, was a slim, clever, dark young man of what is commonly called the Latin-American type. His eyes, looking like deep black cinders or live coals, according to his mood, were always capable of keeping his thoughts from Roberta.

He was regarding her now with extreme impatience and not a little contempt, though this Roberta could not see. She saw only his obvious good looks and his odd, but to her, charming manners. Jack was "so different." It was to come here and meet Jack that she had quarreled with her father. She saw herself as a daring and sophisticated young woman, hampered by an old-fashioned parent with ridiculous ideas of what his daughter should and should not do.

To Jack Navarro, with a cosmopolitan upbringing and a sophisticated outlook on women and life, Roberta was a rather troublesome child. But he had orders to keep her amused and interested and he was doing this, with an ease that bored him. They had reached and finished the dessert stage, and Jack had produced, with a flourish, the expected and inevitable silver flask. Roberta, though her pulses quickened at this sign that she was regarded as an experienced woman, shook her head.

"Can't," she declared. "No use asking me, Jack. In the first place I don't like it, and in the second place I've given my father my solemn promise I won't touch it until I am twenty-one."

Jack shrugged his shoulders, helped himself and slid his flask back into his pocket. Drinking was not countenanced at Indian Lodge, and one had to be careful how one did it, if one wanted to come again. It was a convenient place to meet this girl and until he got what he wanted. Sometimes he doubted if he would succeed with her. She was to him so essentially stupid, so unused to, or slow to grasp meanings of looks or words in the same they were playing. These North American girls were so often educated in everything else but sex.

Still he had been told that to intrigue this girl was his share of the business on hand, so he lifted his eyes and gave her a long look and a slow smile. "Any hurry?" he asked.

The girl looked at him doubtfully. "Well, I don't feel exactly comfortable leaving father alone so long. I should have gone back when I saw those servants going to the island. He can't move, you know, without help."

Jack's eyes were cinders. "Is that so? Permanent?"

Roberta shook her head. "Oh no. The doctor says he will be all right in a little while. It's just that his rheumatism is rather severe, just now."

Navarro looked at her narrowly. "How soon will you be able to meet me again? Tomorrow night?"

Roberta shook her head. "I don't believe so. It isn't easy to get away at night. Day after tomorrow, I might, but tomorrow I'll be busy with the new servants. I won't have time for anything else."

She took a cigarette from him and, as he lighted it for her, looked at him a little curiously.

"Funny, isn't it?"

"What is funny?" He asked it quickly, and with the foreigners' sensitiveness to the American's strange idea of what is "funny."

"That we should see so much of each other in this way. When Hal Brice introduced us at the Princeton football game, I never expected to see you again."

"Why?"

"Oh, because you're so much older, and Hal said you were frightfully sophisticated."

Navarro smiled, relieved. He had forced Brice to give him that introduction at a price and whether he liked it or not. One never knew what an American like Brice might say. They knew at once so much and so little. But Brice had fortunately held his tongue.

"He is a nice boy, that Hal Brice, and he plays a good game, but he is too young—just a boy—to play my game."

"What is your game?" Roberta asked it with something of her father's directness.

"Just now it's making you like me more than a little, Roberta," he said softly, and put his hand gently over hers.

Roberta looked at him now flushing, a little puzzled. It was part of this man's fascination that he spoke sparingly and was lavish with his caresses—in private. It confused the girl, made it hard for her to judge him coolly, as she did the boys of her own set and age. She did not even know whether she liked it or not, whether she really liked Jack, but she could not run away, and she came back again, and again, still undecided.

"I do like you, Jack, only—"

"Only what?"

"Well—I like other people, too."

"As well?"

"Better," answered the honest Roberta, with a smile that robbed her speech of all brusqueness. "You see I've known them longer."

"The first time I saw you," Jack said it so softly and with such apparent calmness that Roberta wondered at him, and at herself. "I loved you so well that no one I had known before could have been only you."

Roberta drew a long breath. It was marvelous and so tremendously grown up to listen to a man—not a boy, but a full-grown man—saying such things to her! Why Jack must be all of twenty-five! And her father treated her like a child! But though Roberta was dazzled she was not blinded, nor carried off her feet, yet. She was conscious of a great disappointment with herself, that his words did not raise more tumult in her breast. It must be because she had grown older and more used to things, that she could listen to such speeches and feel, though her breath came faster, and she liked it, that she was not greatly moved.

"Will you not come tomorrow?" Jack asked her again. "I ask you to."

There was something behind the voice, something hard, and insistent, something mocking, something that said that she was only a woman and must do what he asked. It was the first touch of the iron hand of the foreign man behind the velvet glove of the foreign manners that so charmed her.

"No," Roberta said it almost angrily. "I cannot come tomorrow. I will come Wednesday."

There was silence, a silence that spoke of displeasure on Navarro's part. Then he said: "No, I cannot come Wednesday, but I will come Thursday."

It was the girl who hesitated, and then made up her mind. "All right, Thursday, then. Where?"

"Here," Roberta said quickly. "I think you ought to come to the house and meet my father, don't you? I don't like dodging about to avoid father and the crowd."

Navarro frowned. This girl would upset all plans unless she was kept in hand. "I'll come for you. I'll wait for you on the river road."

"All right," Roberta agreed slowly. "Come to the house if you like."

"No, the road," Jack replied.

It was possible to reduce Italy to a number of cities, it is further possible to reduce those cities to a number of families. I have never lived long in Italy, but all my Italian friends—and I have had many—and all my non-Italian friends who have lived long in Italy, agree that family life is more jealously guarded from outside influences than that of any other European country. One can stay for a score of years in Rome and be intimately acquainted with nobles and politicians and officials and the middle classes and the masses, meeting them in assemblies and in clubs and getting on the most confidential relations with them; and still, at the end of a score of years, realize that one has rarely if ever been invited to cross the threshold of an Italian household and to mingle intimately with an Italian family. From "Europe in Zigzag," by Stanley Huddleston.

A golfing husband was entertaining a friend. They were left alone talking for some time after dinner. Then the wife entered the dining room to hear her husband pass some remark about "a hole in one."

"My goodness," she said. "Are you still talking about golf?"

"No, dear," said her husband, with a smile, "we're talking about socks."

FARM STOCK

SANITATION PLAN TO RAISE HORSES

Begin Measures Before Colt Is Foaled and Keep On.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

An ounce of prevention for colts at the "tender age" is worth more in raising strong, vigorous farm horses than a pound of cure after the horses are mature, the United States Department of Agriculture finds.

A study conducted in Montana by the department showed that the most effective, and likewise the most economical, way to raise healthy horses involves a series of sanitation measures beginning before the colt is foaled and continuing until it is large enough and vigorous enough to withstand the ravages of stomach worms, intestinal round worms, pin worms, blood worms, and bots.

The first step in the program recommended by the department is the use of drugs to remove parasites from the mare before, or soon after, breeding. The mare is then kept on clean fields until she foals, so there will be little likelihood of reinfection. The young foal, thus given a start in life free from parasites, will remain reasonably free from them if kept on pastures free from infected animals and away from the insanitary conditions usually associated with and favorable to parasites.

The use of a similar plan in raising mules in Louisiana and Nevada was followed by the production of healthy and vigorous animals in place of inefficient mules of low vitality that were subject to colic and various other disorders.

Mixed Bred Steers of Uniform Type and Size

Steers fattened in carload lots will sell best if they are uniform in type, size and color markings. Carloaders or smaller lots of fat animals of various weights, types and colors always sell at a discount. The man who feeds them doesn't get what they are worth, even when the market is strong and active for all grades. Aberdeen Angus steers, being black, hornless and generally uniform in type, often sell at a premium, as feeders or as fat cattle. Hereford steers, which are conspicuously uniform in color markings and adhere closely to the same type, also sell at a disadvantage in the market. Sometimes they may be red, white, roan and red and white in color. Experienced buyers, however, are fair in their bids on Shorthorns, and this breed produces a high percentage of the market-topping carloads.

Feeding Cubes to Live Stock Is Wise Method

Feeding cubes to live stock (a common practice in England) is on the increase in this country. Why? With the feed pressed into cubes there is less waste, or in the trough. The cubes do not blow away nor sift through cracks in the feed bunk. Various concentrates are used in making the cubes—linseed meal, cottonseed meal, bran, tankage, molasses, etc. Either a supplement to home-grown grain, or a complete ration, can be had. Sheep and hog cubes are about one-half inch each way; steer cubes, about an inch each way. If you must feed on the ground, try cubes. The cubes will work in self-feeders, too. Both sheep and steer cubes have been found good on the western ranges.

Live Stock Facts

Sheep are economical in their utilization of feed. They will subsist largely upon bulky feeds.

Feeding the brood sows some potassium iodide in their slop several weeks before farrowing will prevent hairless pigs.

Proper feed, care, and management of the boar are the essential factors in the production of healthy, vigorous pigs as far as the male side of the family is concerned.

The person who has consistently raised sheep or followed the practice of buying and feeding western lambs over a period of years has almost invariably profited materially therefrom.

Since ancient times shepherds have known that ewes when bred in a painful condition raised more twins than when not in vigorous condition, so that much stress can well be placed on the physical condition of the ewe.

Lambs infested with the common stomach worm are thin and lack thriftiness; further symptoms of stomach worms are pale papery-like skins, constant scouring with thinness, and in advanced cases, swelling under the lower jaw, commonly referred to as bottle neck.

BAYER ASPIRIN is always SAFE

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS

UNLESS you see the name Bayer and the word genuine on the package as pictured here you can never be sure that you are taking genuine Bayer Aspirin tablets which thousands of physicians have always prescribed.

The name Bayer means genuine Aspirin. It is your guarantee of purity—your protection against imitations. Millions of users have proved that it is safe.

BAYER ASPIRIN DOES NOT DEPRESS THE HEART

Aspirin is the trade-mark of Bayer manufacture of monosodiumsalicylate of salicylic acid.

Genuine Bayer Aspirin promptly relieves:

HEADACHES, SORE THROAT, LUMBAGO, RHEUMATISM, NEURITIS, NEURALGIA, COLDS, ACES and PAINS

Light Ray Employed to Open and Close Doors

Hard-working hotel waiters, struggling through kitchen doors with heavily-laden trays and performing like circus acrobats to make the passage safely, need no longer suffer these agonizing evolutions, for the photoelectric cell has come to the rescue. The General Electric company recently demonstrated an automatic door opener by means of which, without conscious human effort, a door can be made to open swiftly and silently—and, what is more, close in the same manner.

A ray of light focused on a photoelectric cell passes in front of the door. When this ray is interrupted it sets a hydraulic door opener to work, through the agency of a photoelectric relay. The cell and light are placed several feet from the door and, as a person approaches, his body interrupts the light ray directed at the cell.

The current, hardly great enough to be dignified by the name, is amplified through three large vacuum tubes, the last a power tube. It then sets in motion a small motor which operates the hydraulic device, thus actually opening the door. A lever, comparable to those found on ordinary door checks, forces the door open. A suitable time when the door before the door closes. When the ray of light is again focused on the tube, the device is again ready for operation. The length of time during which the door is held open can be changed by adjusting the control. —Scientific American.

For TEETHING troubles

FUSSY, fretful . . . of course babies are uncomfortable at teething time! And mothers are worried because of the little upsets which come so suddenly then. But there's one sure way to comfort a restless, teething child. Castoria — made especially for babies and children. It's perfectly harmless, as the formula on the wrapper tells you. It's mild in taste and action. Yet it rights little upsets with a never-failing effectiveness.

That's the beauty of this special children's remedy! It may be given to tiny infants—as often as there is need. In cases of colic and similar disturbances, it is invaluable. But it has every-day uses all mothers should understand. A coated tongue calls for a few drops to ward off constipation; so does any suggestion of bad breath. Whenever older children don't eat well, don't rest well, or have any little upset, a more liberal dose of this pure vegetable preparation is usually all that's needed. Genuine Castoria has Chase H. Fletcher's signature on the wrapper. Doctors prescribe it.

Casual Visitor Seldom Seen in Italian Home

If it is possible to reduce Italy to a number of cities, it is further possible to reduce those cities to a number of families. I have never lived long in Italy, but all my Italian friends—and I have had many—and all my non-Italian friends who have lived long in Italy, agree that family life is more jealously guarded from outside influences than that of any other European country. One can stay for a score of years in Rome and be intimately acquainted with nobles and politicians and officials and the middle classes and the masses, meeting them in assemblies and in clubs and getting on the most confidential relations with them; and still, at the end of a score of years, realize that one has rarely if ever been invited to cross the threshold of an Italian household and to mingle intimately with an Italian family. From "Europe in Zigzag," by Stanley Huddleston.

A golfing husband was entertaining a friend. They were left alone talking for some time after dinner. Then the wife entered the dining room to hear her husband pass some remark about "a hole in one."

"My goodness," she said. "Are you still talking about golf?"

"No, dear," said her husband, with a smile, "we're talking about socks."

NOTICE OF THE FILING OF A PETITION FOR AN IMPROVED GRAVEL ROAD IN FRANKLIN AND WILMINGTON TOWNSHIP, DEKALB COUNTY, INDIANA

Notice is hereby given to the property owners of Franklin and Wilmington Townships, DeKalb County, Indiana, and to all others concerned that there was filed in the office of the Auditor of DeKalb County, Indiana, on the 8th day of January, 1931, a petition for the construction of an improved gravel road in Franklin and Wilmington Townships, DeKalb County, Indiana, the beginning the route and terminus of said road, the materials to be used, the width of the road and a general description of the same being set out in the petition in words and figures as follows, to-wit:

State of Indiana,
County of DeKalb, ss:
Before the Board of Commissioners of DeKalb County, Indiana
In the Matter of the Petition by William Fetter, et al. for a Free, Improved Gravel Road on the Township Line between Franklin and Wilmington Townships, DeKalb County, Indiana
To the Honorable Board of Commissioners of DeKalb County, Indiana:

The undersigned, being more than fifty (50) adult freeholders and voters of Franklin and Wilmington Townships, both in DeKalb County, Indiana, of which at least ten are from each of the said townships, do hereby petition your Honorable Board that the following described highway, to-wit:

Beginning at a point on the township line between Franklin and Wilmington Townships, DeKalb County, Indiana on the section line between section three (3) in Wilmington Township and Section thirty-four (34) in Franklin Township where the Butler-Hamilton road intersects said township line and running thence west approximately one and three quarters miles on said township line to a point 1000 feet east of the north-west corner of Section Four (4) in Wilmington Township and there to end, shall be constructed, established and improved by the construction of a turnpike gravel road over the entire route of the road described.

Your petitioners would further show to the Board that the said proposed highway runs on its entire length on a township line and that it connects at its east terminus with the Cloyd Snyder Highway, a part of the county road system of DeKalb County and that it also intersects with the Butler-Hamilton Road, also a part of the county highway system of DeKalb County.

Your petitioners further say that they recommend that the grade of the said proposed road be twenty-four (24) feet in width and that the said highway to twelve (12) feet in width and that the same be improved by placing gravel thereon to the depth of ten inches and that the said highway shall be sufficiently graded and drained before placing thereon the materials for the said improvement.

Your petitioners further say that there is a necessity of the improvement of said road for the following reasons:

1. That the said is a township line road and it is now a poor road and will be for public utility when completed and that the benefits derived therefrom will exceed the cost of construction.

2. That the present system of maintaining and keeping up said road is a failure and inadequate to keep the road in condition for travel.

3. That the said highway is a part of a United States Mail Route.

4. That the most practical way to build said roads and to keep it in repair is to construct it under the laws of the State of Indiana, relating to the construction of highways on township lines, so that the same may become a part of the gravel road system of DeKalb County, Indiana and be maintained by the said DeKalb County, Indiana.

That the aforesaid road when completed will be approximately one and three quarters miles in length.

Wherefore your petitioners pray your Honorable Board that the said highway described herein be established and improved by grading, draining and graveling as a turnpike gravel road in accordance with the laws of the State of Indiana relating to the construction of highways on township line roads.

Why Jerseys?

Merry Maiden's Brown Lady, a pure bred Jersey owned in Iowa, started on Official Test in September, passed her 25th birthday this month, and is in good condition and going strong. A remarkable accomplishment, but a common trait among Jersey cattle; not only long lived, but profitable production and reproduction. Give a good Jersey cow good feed, good care and careful attention and she usually rewards you with from fifteen to twenty-five years of satisfactory profits.

HATCHABLE EGGS

(By Prof. H. D. Munroe)

To produce strong, healthy chicks it is necessary to have the breeders in good condition. A healthy breeding flock is one that has gone through a molt, has bright red combs and is in good condition. There are three essential requirements to produce good hatchable eggs—green feed, sunlight and milk.

The requirement for a good green feed is that it grew in the sunlight and carries a green color. About the only winter green feed for breeders is alfalfa hay. Later in the season, if the birds are out on grass range, they will not need alfalfa.

Sunlight is very essential to produce good hatches. During the winter when the days are short and sunlight is scarce, cod liver oil is the only substitute. Cod liver oil is a very important winter feed for breeders.

Milk, in some form, is necessary to produce good healthy chicks. It is interesting to know that the combination of alfalfa, milk and cod liver oil will produce healthy chicks in winter just as well as the natural sunlight, green grass and milk will produce them in the spring.

Soft water prevents clogging of the cooling system.

Don't set red raspberries too near the black caps.

Too heavy a mulch around transplanted trees may cause shallow rooting, if the trees are small.

Rubbish in the orchard may harbor many fruit insects and mice. Clean up!

A good mineral mixture should always supplement soybeans when fed to hogs. Five pounds of special steam bone meal, and one pound of common salt is a good mineral mixture.

Radiators and engines become lined just as a teakettle. To clean water systems, dissolve one pound of washing soda in a pail of warm water; fill the water system with this solution; run the motor for 15 minutes, drain, and flush with clean water.

Iceland Althing First

of World Parliaments

Iceland in June, 1930, celebrated two great events: the one hundred nineteenth birthday of Jon Sigurdson, its George Washington, who wronged home rule from Denmark in 1874; the thousandth anniversary of the althing, oldest parliament in the world.

A century before the battle of Hastings, 850 years before our own government was founded, the franklins (free landowners) of Iceland were living under a constitution (the constitution of Ulftot) and a regularly constituted lawmaking body. The althing met in midsummer and was the occasion for great feasts and merrymaking, as well as numerous bruises, lacerations and concussions.

What political life and law were like in the old days is recorded in Iceland sagas and law codes. The althing did not function, perfectly, nor did the judicial system which was set up, the real governing being done by the various chieftains; nevertheless, the althing forms a magnificent tradition. It looks down from its honary eminence with paternal solicitude for such youthful bodies as the English house of commons and the United States congress.

Many Plants That Lure

Insects to Their Death

There are a great many varieties of insectivorous plants which grow almost all over the world. The first group of these plants is known as the pitcher plants, which have the bladders in the form of a pitcher which acts as a death trap for flies and other insects. The insects are attracted by a fragrance or some other lure, enter the mouth of the pitcher, and crawl down toward the bottom, being forced pointing from the sides of the pitcher's throat. The poor fly is thus given no chance to escape and when he reaches the bottom he is caught in the sticky mass of fluid there and his body juices absorbed by the plant. Two other types of insectivorous plants are the Venus flytrap and the Dionaea which grows only in the low coast regions of North Carolina. This little plant is probably the most famous stem variety of the insect-eating plants. A third type is a Sundew Drosera, which is common to Australia. This is also a large genus containing a great variety of species.

Bit of Greece in France

Antibes, like all the other places along the fascinating French Riviera, has had a romantic history, says a writer in the Detroit News. It was founded more than 2,000 years ago by descendants of the Greek colonists who had built a thriving city on the site of Marseilles. Legend says that among these first settlers were some men and women who had come from Greece and that they chose Antibes as a place to build because the scenery there reminded them so much of Greece. Phenicians and Carthaginians, Romans and Gauls, Germans and Italians and French—they have all met on this coast in the centuries that have passed since, but Antibes has managed more than any other town in France to retain its Greek appearance.

University's Art Treasure

A full-size copy of Murillo's "Immaculate Conception" in mosaics is in the chapel of the Catholic university at Washington, a gift from Pope Pius XI. Three artists labored nearly four years in the Vatican mosaic studio to place together nearly 800,000 bits of colored glass and of other mineral compounds which form the finished picture, the original of which is preserved in the Prado at Madrid. The mosaic is 15 feet long and 6 feet wide. With a frame, it weighs 6,000 pounds. The pieces are of 20,000 different tints and shades.

Beautiful Capetown

The sea voyage to South Africa is the fair weather voyage of the world. Capetown, once a remote outpost of civilization, is today one of the world's finest cities. It is not only beautiful and delightfully situated but the cape is historical as well, for it was here in 1487 that Dias saw the sea-route to India and this incited Columbus, who in his search for India found America instead. The discoveries between 1487 and 1497 mark this era as the dawn after the Dark ages and the first rays hit the cape when Dias discovered his way around.

Mythological Birds

Probably the best known of the fabulous birds of prey were the roc, which was a bird so enormous that it obscured the sun when it flew and carried away men in its talons; the phoenix, which was a bird with a beautiful voice and a long tail like a peacock's, which was supposed to rise from the ashes of fire; and the harpy, which was a terrible bird with a woman's face and breast and great claws like an eagle's, which pursued men who had sinned.

Magnification

The magnifying power of a telescope is proportional to its focal length as well as the shortness of focus of its eyepiece. Thus the use of different eyepieces yields different magnifying powers, but those exceeding 1,000 are seldom used because of the trembling of the earth's atmosphere. Compound microscopes may magnify as much as 4,000 times.

Jade Earrings

Told on Her

By HELEN ST. BERNARD

(Copyright.)

FOR twenty-five years the annual ball at "Strathmore School for Girls" had been the big event; they all the cadets from the nearby military academy came in their colorful uniforms of French blue; then sweethearts, fathers and mothers from home.

Tonight the college was in readiness for that day of days—tomorrow. At her window at the far end of the second floor hall Sally Cole, teacher of English and literature, sat looking out over the rolling campus bathed in a soft silver moonlight. Twenty years ago she had been a girl of Strathmore and had been thrilled at the prospect of the annual ball. She, too, had had her party dress—a white voile with lace-edged ruffles around the bottom.

And it was twenty years ago tonight that the waltz had two-step had sounded out over the campus until the wee hours of the morning, and Sally Cole had danced nine dances with the tall blond cadet in blue; had walked with him beneath the oaks in the moonlight, and eaten her ice cream and cake with him behind the palms in the gymnasium. He had liked her white dress, slum. He had liked her white dress, slum. He had liked her white dress, slum. He had liked her white dress, slum.

Sally had never left Strathmore. Following her graduation she had been placed on the faculty. And she was smilingly tolerant of the whispered conversations long after the quiet bell had rung. They were young, and only once . . . she argued to herself.

She moved to her dressing table to arrange her hair when a dark, slender girl came in, radiant in a coral chiffon frock.

Alice Wayne was the school's harmonium and rules meant little to her. Sally knew of the happy-go-lucky father who was seldom home long enough to get acquainted with his lovely, motherless daughter. Alice showed her letters from Africa, Asia, Central America and recently, from Egypt.

"I thought I'd find you dressing for the dance, Miss Sally, dear. Alex is here, and I don't know what to do with him."

"Alex?" queried Sally. "Which one of the swains is Alex?"

"Alex is my father. He landed in New York this morning."

"Oh, I am glad he is your father. I thought it might be another admirer arriving in addition to the three already here. Aren't you happy to see your father?"

"Oh, yes," drawled the girl. "But I hardly know Alex. He is a good old scout, but such a vagabond! But I do declare, Miss Sally, dear, I don't know what I shall do with him with Bobby and Hank and Bart to look after."

"Well, my dear, do not neglect your father. You are all he has, you know. Let the boys shift for themselves."

Sally smiled, with the despairing wisdom of youth.

"Alex is lecturing me something fierce for having my hair slicked. Says he likes old-fashioned girls. Oh, Miss Sally, let me do your hair. Part it in the middle and coil it low on your neck. Please, Miss Sally. . . . And you should have earrings."

Sally Cole smiled at herself in the mirror an hour later. Her usually sleek hair was softened over the ears and coiled low on her neck. Her dress was white, a lovely soft silken thing she had bought in New York. Sally always had a white dress. For a second her hand toyed with the jade earrings in her jewel case. Twenty years ago tonight she had worn those exquisite things . . . and then she was fastening them in her ears.

As she joined the other members of the faculty, Alice Wayne smiled her and came across the floor holding fast to the hand of a big blond man.

"Miss Cole, Alex. And Miss Sally, this is my father."

He looked straight into Sally's eyes, questioning gaze. He smiled at her as he took her hand in his and with the other hand, he touched the earring that nearly reached to her shoulder.

"Earrings of jade . . . a white dress . . . Strathmore . . . and those twenty years are bridges. I would have known you anyway, but the jade really proves you are you. I came back, twenty years ago, but you had not given me your name! I couldn't find you, but I never forgot."

"For the love of Mike, Alex, what are you talking about?" demanded his daughter.

"I mean, young lady, you can save a dance for your old dad along about the last. I will be busy up to that time. Here comes your young Loch-Invar in blue. Run away, my dear, and we'll see you later."

Alice Wayne came into Sally Cole's room, long after the last guest had gone. She snuggled down in the big chair beside the window.

"I don't know what it is all about. Miss Sally, but Alex and I are ever so happy. Some one to lecture us and love us. We both need you. And I'm ever so glad that every person doesn't wear jade earrings . . . if that is what made Alex fall for you tonight. Just think! What if he hadn't seen you first . . ."

"But he did, Alice. He saw them first twenty years ago . . . and he didn't forget . . ."

Fairy Tale for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

"I didn't hear what you heard," said Netty, "as I was busy swinging by my tail and didn't pay much attention to the people outside of my zoo room." Netty and Elsie were both monkeys.

"Well," said Elsie, "I was sitting on my perch, and so I heard what was being said."

"But let me tell you, the keeper told them some things."

"What did the keeper tell them?" What did the people say?" asked Netty.

"Listen, and I will tell you," said Elsie.

So Elsie and Netty sat on the same perch and Elsie put her arm around Netty and said:

"Keep calm when you hear it, for the keeper said the people right."

"Good," said Netty. "The keeper is always doing things for us."

"He is splendid."

"He most certainly is," said Elsie, "and he says that only people who care about animals and who love them when they're well, or sick, or naughty, and who understand them, should be the ones who are allowed to take care of them."

"That's right," said Netty. "Just suppose we had any other keeper but the one we have."

"Wouldn't it be too dreadful?"

"My dear Netty, don't even say such a thing. The very thought sends shivers from the top of my head to the tip of my tail."

"Listen and I Will Tell You."

CORN FRITTERS ARE RICH, SUBSTANTIAL

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

When the lunch or supper supplies seem a trifle less hearty than usual, it is a good time to have fritters, which are rich and substantial—in fact, too substantial to have in addition to other foods on a heavy dinner menu. With cold meat at any meal, they are tasty and appetizing. Fritters may be made of many materials, but are extra good when the basis is canned corn. The recipe below is from the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture.

1 1/2 cups sifted soft-wheat flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
1 cup drained canned corn
1 cup liquid, either juice from the can or milk, or the two mixed
1 egg
1 lb. melted fat

Mix the flour, baking powder, and salt. Mix the juice from the canned corn or milk, or whatever liquid is used, the egg after it has been beaten slightly, and the canned corn. Stir this liquid mixture gradually into the dry ingredients. Add the melted fat. If the corn is very moist, even after the liquid has been drained from it, more flour may be needed. Dried corn which has been soaked and cooked until tender may also be used.

Fry the corn fritters in deep fat or, if preferred, in a skillet in shallow fat. In either case drop the mixture by spoonfuls into the fat and fry rather slowly. The fritters need time to cook through to the center before the outside becomes too brown. Drain the fritters on absorbent paper and serve hot.

Hints About Things Good to Eat

By NELLIE MAXWELL

Those persons and things, then, that inspire us to do our best, that make us live at our best, when we are in their presence, that call forth from us our latent and unsuspected personality, that nourish and support that personality—these are our friends—Randolph S. Bourne.

In many homes fresh cookies are so much more enjoyed than a large amount baked at one time. Here is the ice-box cookie which may be kept many days and when a tin of fresh cookies is wanted, slice off a few, put them in the oven and bake them as brown as you like.

Ice Box Cookies.—Take one cupful each of butter, brown and granulated sugar, two eggs, one teaspoonful each of salt and soda, one cupful of nuts, one teaspoonful each of almond and vanilla extract and four and one-fourth cups of flour. Cream the butter, add the sugar, eggs and other ingredients. Roll into two rolls and let stand on a cloth in a pan placed in the ice box. The cloth keeps the dough from flattening and sticking to the pan and thus losing its round shape. Slice very thin, decorate with half a nut meat, a raisin or cherry as one's taste suggests.

Another food so much liked in all our homes is fresh rolls. It takes time to prepare a light and crisp roll. Here is a recipe which will keep for a week or longer in the ice chest and a pan of biscuits may be baked any time one cares to serve them.

Ice Box Rolls.—Dissolve two compressed yeast cakes in one-fourth of a cupful of warm water, adding two teaspoonfuls of sugar. Add two tablespoonfuls of shortening, one teaspoonful of salt, one-half cupful of sugar to a pint of boiling water. Beat two eggs and mix all together with four cups of flour. Beat well, then add three and one-half cups more of flour, mix well with a spoon but do not knead. Set away in the refrigerator until the next day at noon, when it will be ready to use. Handle the rolls quickly, brush with melted lard or sweet fat when they are placed in the pan. Let stand until more than double their bulk; keep covered while rising in a warm place.

With these two mixtures in the ice box, one may be ready for the unexpected and need not worry.

Coffee Cake Most Excellent.—Dissolve one yeast cake in half a cupful of warm water, adding one teaspoon-

Forcemeat Makes a Good Stuffing

Stuffing a Breast of Lamb With Forcemeat.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Did you ever try roast breast of lamb, stuffed with "forcemeat"? Forcemeat is a chef's name for a well-seasoned mixture of chopped meat, bread crumbs, and vegetables, used for stuffings of various kinds. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture gives the following directions for preparing this cut so that all the delicious flavor of roast lamb is retained and the meat is tender. The breast is one of the least expensive cuts of lamb.

Select a breast of lamb, including the forehand, which will be used to make the forcemeat stuffing. Have the butcher crack the bones of the breast so that it can be served between the ribs. Wipe the meat with a damp cloth. Remove the forehand, and trim off the meat and grind it. Make a pocket in the breast by cutting through the flesh close to the ribs. Sprinkle the inside of the pocket with salt and pepper, pile in lightly the hot forcemeat, made according to the directions below, and sew the edges together. Rub the outside with salt, pepper and flour. Lay the stuffed breast, ribs down, on a rack in an open roasting pan. Do not add water. Place the roast in a hot oven (450 degrees F.) and sear for thirty minutes. If there is not sufficient fat to keep the meat from drying out, baste with melted fat, or lay a strip or two of bacon on top. After searing, reduce the oven temperature rapidly to 300 degrees Fahrenheit and continue the cooking in the open pan until the meat is tender. The total time required will probably be one and one-half to one and three-fourths hours. If there is more stuffing than the breast will hold, bake it in a separate dish or use it as stuffing for onions to serve with the meat. Serve with brown gravy made from the drippings.

For the baked onions, choose a large, mild-flavored variety. Cut the onion in half crosswise and simmer in lightly salted water until about half done. Lift the onions out and arrange on a baking dish. Remove the centers without disturbing the outer layers. Chop the onion centers and add to the forcemeat stuffing. Fill the onion shells with this mixture, cover, and bake in a moderate oven for about one-half hour, or until the onions are tender. Remove the cover from the baking dish during the last of the cooking so that the onions will brown well on top.

Forcemeat Stuffing.

Ground lean meat 1 sprig parsley
2 cups fine dry bread crumbs 1/4 cup celery seed
2 tbs. butter 1/4 tsp. savory
1/4 cup chopped onion 1 tsp. salt
1 tbs. chopped onion 1/4 tsp. pepper

Melt the butter in a skillet, add the onion and celery, and cook for two or three minutes. Add the ground meat and stir until the juice evaporates and the meat browns slightly. Then add the bread crumbs and seasoning and stir until well mixed.

POOR POSTURE CAN BE REMEDIED

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Poor posture in childhood often becomes so confirmed in people that the bones and muscles assume faulty positions permanently, to the great disadvantage of the person concerned. Bad posture crowds heart and lungs, makes the stomach and intestines sag, and causes muscle strain. It also fosters shallow breathing, poor circulation, bad digestion, sluggish bowel action.

If taken in time, poor posture can often be remedied. Sometimes it is a result of unsoftened early rickets, as in the case of the child shown in the accompanying picture, by the United States Department of Agriculture.

Rice Is Served With Curried Dishes

A curry of vegetables is an East Indian idea. Rice is always served with curried dishes in the east. It is cooked separately, so that it is dry and flaky, and placed in a ring around the other ingredients of the curry, with the sauce poured over them so that the flavor is well distributed. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture says this vegetable curry is very easy to make and quite delicious on a cold winter night.

1/2 cup rice 4 tbs. butter or other fat
1 cup diced onion 1/4 tsp. salt
1 cup diced carrots 1/4 tsp. curry
1 cup fresh or 1 cup water-cress
1 cup fresh or 1 cup water-cress
1 cup fresh or 1 cup water-cress
1 cup fresh or 1 cup water-cress

Wash the rice and cook in two quarts of boiling salted water. Drain in a colander, pour cold water through and let stand over steam until the grains swell and become separate. Cook the vegetables in a small quantity of water and just before removing from the stove add the canned peas, or if fresh peas are available, cook them with the other vegetables. Use the liquid from the vegetables and add the fat, salt, curry and sauce. On a hot platter make a ring of the cooked rice, pile the vegetables in the center, pour over them the liquid.

Jackets Last Word in Economy

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

One of the most popular movements in the realm of costume design at the present moment is the jacket-plus frock. These little removable jackets are the last word in economy and as chic, they are all that and then some.

Not only do these cunning separate jackets provide sleeves to the sleeveless but they enable the frock to play a dual role—with the jacket a charming afternoon costume as you see in the picture, sans jacket the transformation of an informal to a formal gown. Small wonder is it, that in creating the new spring and summer modes, designers are working the idea for all it is worth.

The model pictured has been aptly called a "double-date" dress for reasons which are obvious. As it stands in the illustration it is ready to go stepping to most any afternoon affair from backgammon party luncheon here or there amidst smart environment. Comes "after six" with its round of more formal dine, dance and theater parties to which this costume of lovely wine-red bengal chiffon crepe tunes in at a moment's notice, simply by removing the jacket, thus rendering the gown sleeveless.

Note the graceful girdle. It is made of shaded sheer velvet. In adjusting the jacket one may or may not draw this colorful sash through slots at the side seams. The advantage in doing so is that the jacket will not "fly open" to the annoyance of its wearer. Then, too, it gives a very charming effect to tie the jacket down across the front just as it is shown in the picture.

The merit of sheer crepe such as this bengal type is becoming more and more apparent. There is everything to recommend it, from the fact of its being durable and practical at the same time that it is flattering as well as being sufficiently dressy for festive occasion. With good reason style creators are continuing to exploit these frocks in solid colors such as the model illustrated.

Quite a few of the midseason dresses of chiffon or sheer crepe are topped with either lace, beaded or self-material yokes, the latter usually in pale pink or a delectable pastel tint of pure white.

Speaking of the separate jacket, an interesting outcome of the mode is the solid-colored chiffon frock with a bolero or novelty-cut jacket of lace in matching color. A sleeveless sheer gown, if it does not have a jacket of self material, is almost sure to be complemented with a bolero or some all-over lace. In Paris they are bending these lace jackets and they are very effective.

The SANDMAN STORY

ABOUT THE BEARS

"ONE of my babies is with me," said Mother Black Bear to Billie Brownie, who had gone to call on her in the heart of the great mountain forests.

"The other two are at yonder camp," she said.

"You know that the most seasoned and fearless hunter will tremble if he even imagines a mother grizzly with her young is nearby.

"A mother grizzly is so devoted to her young, so intense in her desire to protect, that any mother grizzly is dangerous because she looks upon all men as enemies of her children.

"I Shall Tell My Friends What You Say," said Billie Brownie.

"With us it is quite different. Often campers will capture some of our young to amuse and entertain them throughout the summer.

"There is nothing quite so cunning as a bear cub, nor so amusing and appealing and funny and jolly.

"Of course at times a bear cub is cross, but he is cunning even then.

"My two were captured when I was driven up a tree by a dog belonging to yonder campers. I had, as I've told you, three little ones, two black and one brown.

"They left one of the black ones with me, this one you see.

"Throughout the season they played and frisked about and were left off their leashes to go up the trees for naps.

"Then the campers would go up after them and they'd come hurrying down like naughty children who know they have stayed out too long.

"Every evening I went to the camp, I and my little one, just to see that all was well.

"I would not venture too near. I was afraid of that dog. Naturally I would be.

"And I haven't been able to get over that fear.

"But I liked to see that all was going well and to keep a mother bear's eye on my young.

"I can't fight as a grizzly with a grim, relentless, fierce power.

"I am the kind of a mother bear that I am.

"But I am looking after the baby I have with me—really, he is no longer a baby.

"You will see if you stay around long enough that he grows and grows.

"In fact, it is lucky that his skin and fur grows, too, so that he is always well covered, as, if it weren't for that, I don't know how I'd keep him in clothes—he grows so.

"I've heard campers saying that their children just grew out of their clothes, and it was so hard to keep getting them new things.

"That I can well understand. But they should have bear ways.

"When our children grow in size their coats grow with them.

"Surely that is sensible. In fact, animals have many sensible ways which people have not."

"That is true," Billie Brownie said. "I shall tell my friends what you say. I feel that they will agree with you.

"And I think, too, they will agree that a little bear cub is about the dearest little thing in the world."

Billie Brownie hadn't long to stay. He had many engagements to keep, but he promised Mother Black Bear that he would be back again and see how her children grew.

"They grow right before your very eyes," said Mother Black Bear. But, as Billie Brownie went off, he said to himself:

"Mother Grizzly is a dangerous lady, but she loves her children more than Mother Black Bear does—that is certain."

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

TO MAKE BRICKS WITHOUT STRAW

FOR several thousand years this phrase has been used in a great many languages and always in the same sense—that of undertaking a task which is either impossible or, one which is rendered difficult in the extreme because of the failure to be supplied with some material or aid that is vital to the accomplishment of the matter in hand.

As many of our readers may be aware, this line, like many others in daily use, comes to us from the Bible.

We have it from the book of Exodus, in which is described in detail the trials and tribulations of the Israelites during their enslavement by the Egyptians, one of which was the burden imposed upon them of making bricks without straw.

This, incidentally, was the straw which, figuratively speaking, broke the camel's back and which led to the infliction upon the Egyptians of the series of plagues, culminating in the long trek of the Israelites to the Promised Land and the decline and fall of the empire of the pharaohs.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

TO CURE HICCOUGHS

ACCORDING to the American Folk Lore society they have in some sections a cure for hiccoughs which consists of putting the thumb against the lower lip with the fingers under the chin and saying nine times: "hiccup, hiccup over my thumb!" The efficacy of this charm resides in the magic power of the thumb. As far back as the days of the Egyptians the hand was regarded as endowed with mystic significance. Among the Romans each part of the hand had some special quality assigned to it and by the contour and markings of the hand the destiny of its owner could be ascertained by the wise. Chiro-mancy we call this divining by the hand and many there be who believe in it and practice it to this day. Now the Latin word for the thumb was pollex derived from, or allied to, the verb polle, to be strong, and the adjective pollex, strong, powerful, prevailing. Thus the pollex was potent. That the thumb was powerful and prevailing. Thus we see the idea of power and mystic power—attached to the thumb, an idea originating, most likely, in the first place from its formation as compared with the fingers proper. Therefore when we apply the thumb to the lip in a case of hiccoughs we apply that which is powerful and prevailing. And the "hiccups" get the worst of it.

Feminine Repastes

Nothing so amuse a stylish stout as to see one of her friends wearing the new model with the high waistline. At a fashionable club recently, a stylish stout, using the loud speaker, said to a lady who was looking her best:

"My dear, what a youthful model.

girl sixteen could wear it."

"Yes," was the answer, with a careful survey of the hefty build of the stylish stout: "I have the figure of a girl of sixteen, that's why I bought it."

These are the little pleasantries that are the caviars of woman's daily life.

The Average Man

Henri Schwob, president of the American Watch Importers' association, estimates that watches worth $10,000,000 have been smuggled into the country the past year.

"You'd think," Mr. Schwob said to a New York reporter, "that the average man was a watch smuggler. Of course he isn't. The average man smuggles watches—no, that doesn't sound right. I like better old Ab Lincoln's dictum:

"The average man," said old Abe, "He sets out to reform the world and ends up by getting married."

Thursday, January 22, 1931

the boys credit, they wanted to bury that Jinx, yet when their first attempts at connecting with the basket failed they grew disheartened and were ready to admit that the Spencerville Jinx was there in person.

St. Joe's floor work was O. K. They had possession of the ball for the greater part of the game. Can you blame a Coach because the boys couldn't connect with the basket?

Let us all be good sports and say that the boys were off. Every one person, as well as every team has an off day occasionally. St. Joe was off and Spencerville was going good enough to win.

I would like to ask and answer one question.

Why doesn't our local high school win more games?

We usually manage to play a close game and lose by one or two points. Why?

Our team lacks basket ball instinct, girls and boys alike. We start training them when they enter high school and after two or three years are about as far along as they should have been when they entered high school.

The only way to overcome this is to start training when the boy or girl can throw a basket ball.

We have a gym. Why isn't it being used to train these youngsters? We can not blame our coach, teachers or trustees. The coach and teachers do not, have time; the trustees probably never thought of it and was never asked.

We spent nearly fifty thousand dollars for a gym—are we going to let the weather erode this gym or are we going to spend a few more dollars for the services of another teacher to teach gym work to the youngsters so that this gym may bear fruit as was originally intended.

Why continue to knock our coaches, teachers or trustee? Let's get busy and do as other schools are doing, have one teacher who has enough free time to devote to the grade children so that we may overcome our condition and Jinx.

A new era in basket ball is here, let's keep up with it.

High Rank in History for the "Nothing-Buts"

To call the roll of nothing-buts summons an august assembly. There was Socrates, charged with many things, and yet he replied, "I am not a teacher nor yet a poet nor yet a rhetorician or lawyer or pleader or pretender to any superior learning. I am 'nothing but' a seeker after truth."

And St. Paul said, "This one thing I do," and went on to tell how he devoted his entire energies and life to proclaiming a message that he considered worthy of all his efforts. A great man that Paul; he might have been a university professor in Tarasus, "no mean city," or might have risen to a place of influence as a Roman citizen, establishing contacts between the Roman government and the Jewish people so difficult to govern. In that case he would have been forgotten with most of the men of his generation. But he joined the nothing-buts and became immortal.

And so might the list be lengthened with the names of all the great specialists of the world—Galileo and Luther and Newton and Columbus and Washington and hosts of others. And these all would have acknowledged themselves nothing in entire great spheres of knowledge and endeavor but—and in that but lay the fruits of concentration, of idealism, of devotion and perseverance. A noble order are those "nothing-buts."—Detroit News.

Few Groups of Eskimos

Snow-House Dwellers

Snow houses are unknown to the Alaskan Eskimos, and in the Mackenzie delta region such dwellings are used only in emergencies.

The snow house has long been and still is the winter habitation of a number of Eskimo groups scattered eastward from Coronation gulf to Greenland. Even in that desolate region the snow house is regularly inhabited only when no other building materials are available. Some of these Eskimo hunters are very adept at constructing houses of snow for the temporary shelter of their families.

The Labrador Eskimos do not live in snow houses, and out of the 15,000 Eskimos in Greenland only a few hundred living around Cape York ever dwell in such shelters. Even among these the more usual winter dwelling consists of walls of earth or stone and rafters of stone slabs or the large bones of animals.

It is supposed that the Eskimos are descended from American aborigines who gradually worked their way into the Far North. Ancient ruins found throughout the region where snow houses are still regularly or occasionally used indicate that the house of stone, driftwood and whalebone is older than the igloo or hemispherical house built of blocks of snow laid in spiral courses.

Gates of Death Never Opened for These Two

The prophet Elijah and Enoch never saw death, according to the Bible. II Kings 2:11 says: "And it came to pass, as they (Elijah and Elisha) still went on and talked, that, behold, there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, which parted them both asunder; and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven." This is undoubtedly a figurative way of stating that the prophet passed from earth by miraculous translation instead of through the gates of death. Likewise Enoch, the father of Methuselah, never saw death, according to Hebrews 11:5. "By faith," that passage says, "Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and he was not found, because God translated him: for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God." This is the basis for the popular but misleading statement that Methuselah, the oldest man mentioned in the Bible, died before his father did. As a matter of fact Methuselah's father never died, according to the Biblical account. Genesis 5:25 simply says: "And Enoch walked with God; and he was not; for God took him."—Pathfinder Magazine.

Much Hinged on Speed Made by Stage Drivers

Old-time stage drivers were ambitious, writes Edward Martin, in the United States Daily. A true test of their mettle was the delivery of the President's message. The letting of contracts by the Post Office department hinged on these deliveries, and if a driver failed to make good time it meant the cancellation of the contract with his employers and the transfer to a rival company.

Dave Gordon, a noted driver, once carried the President's message from Washington, Pa., to Wheeling, a distance of 32 miles in 2 hours, 20 minutes. He changed teams three times in this distance.

Bill Noble, who died in the eighties, claimed to have made the best time on record. He professed to have driven from Wheeling to Hagerstown, Md., 185 miles, in 15½ hours.

The Mannekin

A few minutes away from the Grand place of Brussels—"noblest of medieval squares"—at the corner of the Rue de l'Eure and the Rue du Chene, stands the famous Mannekin fountain. This impudent rascal is a popular hero, everywhere known as the "oldest citizen of Brussels." Whenever visiting celebrities wish to please the Brusselsers, they present the Mannekin with a new suit of clothes. He has costumes of many nations—from a Napoleonic uniform to a gayly embroidered Japanese kimono—all of which are kept by the city for him to wear on special occasions. But whether naked as he was made, or decked out in an admiral's gold braid, he continues to fulfill his role of being the merriest fountain in Europe.

DEFIES THE DROUGHT

Here, beside a young lady who is 5 feet 4½ inches tall, is a stalk of corn grown on the farm of Ernest Otterback near Woodboro, Md. It was not the tallest in the ten-acre field, and the fact that the yield will be fairly good shows that the crop on this particular field at least defied the prevalent drought. The stalk was exhibited in a store in Thurmont, Md.

Language and Custom

Custom is the most certain mistress of language, as the public stamp makes the current money. But we must not be too frequent with the mint, every day coming, nor fetch words from the extreme and utmost ages; since the chief virtue of a style is perspicuity, and nothing so vicious as it as to need an interpreter. Words borrowed of antiquity do lend a kind of majesty to style, and are, as with out their delight sometimes; for they have the authority of years, and out of their intermission do win themselves a kind of graceful newness. But the eldest of the present, as the newest of the past language, is the best. For what was the ancient language, which some men so dote upon, but the ancient custom?—Ben Jonson, in "The Dignity of Speech."

SOME EVIDENCES OF SPRING

The evidences of spring are numerous for this season of the year, when we expect cold, severe blizzard like days. Here are a few of them noted by the editor this week. A real for sure grass-whopper, and it can be seen at The News office. The animal was carried to town on the trouser leg of Merritt Sechler, and we don't know at what station he got on board, but he arrived safely Monday at our office. Then there is the female sex enjoying horse back riding; roller skating on the side walks; tulip bulbs are pushing forth and some are actually rolling around in the sunlight on their well prepared spring beds; buds are beginning to swell and there is the horse Radish vendor making his weekly calls about town and at the homes. And, too, the junk man is about asking for old rags and paper so that the wife may have every thing cleared for the big cleaning. The sassafras root peddler has not been here yet, but we expect him daily with his supply of spring tonic, the sassafras bark. The robin is on its way north and the fisherman is preparing to make his first spring catch and our last observation is that our young damsels are going bare-legged.

MISS TROAS MAY BECOMES BRIDE OF ORRIS WISE

Orris Wise, owner of the Electric Shop in Auburn, and Miss Troas May, instructor of domestic science in the Ashley high school, were united in marriage in the Christian Church at Angola Saturday morning at 10:30 o'clock. Elder J. O. Rose read the single ring ceremony. The bride was attired in black and white sport ensemble, with a white hat and black footwear. Mr. and Mrs. Dawson Quaintance of Auburn, attended the young couple.

The groom, son of Mr. and Mrs. Earl H. Wise of Corunna, went to school in Auburn eight years, graduating with the class of 1925, and he attended Purdue University and Ball State college. He is a member of the Triangle, an engineering fraternity.

The bride is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John May of Corunna. She also attended the Auburn schools, graduating in 1926. She attended Hillsdale college and graduated from Indiana University in 1930. She belongs to the Pi Beta Phi sorority and to Omicron Nu, national home economics sorority.

Mr. and Mrs. Wise left for Detroit on their wedding trip and will be at home at 212 North Main Street, Auburn, after February 1.

VINTON MILLER
SAYS, "NOT GUILTY"

V. L. Miller of Spencerville, was placed under arrest last Thursday by Sheriff John P. Hoff and his deputy, Herbert Grimm, on a charge of issuing a fraudulent check.

The affidavit, prepared by Prosecuting Attorney Richard W. Sharpless, was signed by Herman L. Brown and alleges that the defendant executed a worthless check to the Auburn American Security Co. last October 31 in the sum of $76.45. The check was drawn on the Farmers and Merchants State bank of Spencerville.

Miller was released immediately after his arrest on bond of $1,000 signed by Frank and W. O. Lake. He retained Atkinson & Husselman as his attorneys.

Miller pleaded not guilty when arraigned in court Friday afternoon.

THE PASSING OF MRS.
AMELIA BENNINGHOFF

Sara Amelia Benninghoff, daughter of Rudolph and Hannah (Donat) Sechler was born in Concord Township on July 15, 1859. She departed from this life on January 22, 1931, aged 71 years, 6 months and 7 days.

On December 25, 1892 she was married to D. F. Benninghoff, who preceded her in death on October 17, 1927. With the exception of two years lived in Butler, most of her life was lived in St. Joe.

The deceased was a broad-minded and educated person, and served several years as a successful public school teacher, and later was a prominent leader in literary circles at home and in the south, where she and her husband spent many winters.

She was a person of good judgment, loyal to every principle of right and truth. She was a soul of honor. Friends and friendships were dear to her. The many acts of kindness and gifts of philanthropy show that she was, indeed, one who loved and sought to benefit mankind.

Since she was the last of a large family to be summoned by death, there remain to mourn only cousins, neighbors, and many friends. "Leaves have their time to fall and flowers to wither at the north winds breath. And stars to set—but all, Thou hast all seasons for thy own, O Death."

The funeral services were conducted from the home on Sunday afternoon at 1 o'clock, with Rev. G. D. Stoll, officiating. Interment was made in the Spencerville cemetery, E. R. Kinsey in charge.

Floyd Barkey is suffering an attack of pneumonia in one lung.

Miss Thelma Curie spent the week-end with friends at Bluffton. Roy Koch and Lester Pugsley experienced a severe shaking up last week when the Koch truck slid off the road north of Newville. The boys were not injured.

Lloyd Miller and wife of Detroit arrived Saturday to be here for this week. Lloyd has been detailed as one of the representatives of the Ford Motor Co. to assist in demonstration by motion picture, of the making of the Ford car. He is in Auburn this week.

Production of an additional 2,000 Auburn cars per month, over the 4,000 capacity of the Connersville plant, will be taken care of at Auburn in addition to the Ford production of 50 cars daily. is the announcement made by officials. Additional men will be put to work.

In both houses of the state legislature, a majority of the important measures concerned taxation or reductions in public expenses. Leaders, throughout the week, adhered to their previously announced plans of driving toward taxation relief and centered their attention on proposed legislation concerning this aim.

The SANDMAN STORY

ABOUT CARE OF HORSES

"I HAVE no cause for complaint," said Raven, the horse. Raven was a very black horse. He was very handsome and his owners loved him dearly. He was the pet of the whole family.

"I have every comfort, every consideration," Raven continued. Billie Brownie was sitting perched up in the corner of Raven's stall.

"When we go out," Raven went on, "there is a rug to put over me when I'm left standing.

"If it rains I'm kept dry. There is always a rug brought along for me just as there is one for the rest of the family throughout all the uncertain and cold weather.

"It is Cold These Days, and It Often Snows."

"But I see other horses, Billie Brownie, and they are not treated as I am.

"They are left standing in the wet. They get drenched and chilly and then they feel so miserable.

"You see, Billie Brownie, horses don't go back home as people do and sit in front of fires and dry off.

"That is why my family see that I don't get wet or cold and that I have a lovely warm stall.

"But people themselves know what it feels like to get wet and stay wet and dry off slowly and uncomfortably.

"Why can't they think of their horses, too?"

"If they let their horses get wet and then allowed them to stand in the house it would be quite different.

"It's cold these days, Billie Brownie, and it often snows.

"We like to be useful but we also want to be treated fairly.

"I'm speaking now for the whole horse world.

"Billie Brownie, can't you get your messengers, the Breeze Brothers, to go around and whisper to people with horses?

"Please put a rug over your horse when you leave him standing in the cold. Put it over him when it is snowing or raining.

"Please see that he is properly shod when it is slippery. It doesn't take long to do this and it saves the poor beast from being nervous and frightened and maybe getting a bad fall.

"Please try to think a horse's thoughts once in a while."

"Will you try to get these messages around, Billie Brownie?"

"Indeed I will do my very best," Billie Brownie said.

"Oh, I do hope they will listen to these messages," Raven sighed.

"You can imagine how it makes me feel to see these things and not be able to do anything about it.

"My family say many fine things to owners of horses who are not being kind.

"If they could only think of it all as though they were horses it seems to me it would help."

"That would help a great deal," Billie Brownie said. "And I'm going to do all I can to help."

"Oh, you make my horse heart very glad," said Raven.

Then Billie Brownie was off, and Raven went to sleep.

He had a beautiful dream that all horses were treated kindly and just as well as he was.

It was a lovely dream, and he woke up feeling so happy.

"I just hope my dream comes true," Raven neighed to himself.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

SINGING BEFORE BREAKFAST

HE WAS a gloomy killjoy who first said "Sing before you eat, cry before you sleep." The superstition is purely psychological in origin. Jane gets up in the morning and comes down singing to breakfast. Before bedtime something has gone wrong and Jane is in tears. Then somebody says: "And she was so happy this morning; I heard her singing all the way downstairs."

This contrast between Jane's state of mind in the early morning and her state of mind at night makes an impression, naturally, upon the whole family—brings into high relief the fact that she sang before breakfast on the day of her sorrow.

The many hundreds of times, perhaps, that Jane has sung before breakfast and things have gone smoothly with her all day are not remembered. Why should they be? There was, upon those occasions, no violent contrast between her state in the morning and her state in the evening to impress them upon the mind. We make our psychological superstitions out of coincidences, for and contrasts, while ordinary routine leaves our imaginations untouched.

SMILES

GABBY GERTIE

"You may turn your back on the tale, but you'll always 'Remember the Name.'"

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"ELSIE FROM CHELSEA"

Riding one morning, my fare I'd just paid—

Oh, what a lovely day!

Gave up my seat to a sweet little maid,

Oh, what a lovely day!

Tho' she was really a stranger to me,

Soon in a deep conversation were we;

Told her her name was E-L-S-I-E, from C-H-E-L-S-E-A.

HARRY DAGRE is the author not only of "Elsie From Chelsea" whose first stanza has just been quoted but of a great many other one-time popular songs chief among which are "Daisy Bell" and that infatigable old-timer "A Bicycle Built For Two."

All these songs made their debut in the Nineties and they supplied the impetus to an avalanche of waltz music which for several decades literally flooded the United States.

The Nineties were also famous as the period during which song slides, beautifully illustrated or shall we say intriguingly stimulating, forerunners of the modern motion picture were introduced to promote popular songs.

"Elsie From Chelsea" particularly had a beautiful set of slides, which with the good material supplied it in the form of a catchy tune and winsome words soon turned the song into a hit.

Said she had nowhere particular to go—

Oh, what a lovely day!

Told her the hint I was not very slow—

Oh, what a lovely day!

Soon we were quaking as lovers can quak—

Told her I loved her, but she answered "Hush!"

Then when I kissed her, she said, with a blush,

"Oh, what a beautiful day!"

Want and we supped in a well-known cafe—

Oh, what a lovely night!

I was bankrupt before we came away—

Oh, what a lovely night!

Frape you will guess that it ended in strife.

Got a black eye and escaped with my life—

Nonsense! The end is that she is my wife!

We have been married today.

He kept him in his community as Dictionary Henry, a local application applied because of his attempts to splutter big words all over his conversation. Until recently Henry and his family of fifteen dwelt in a two-room house. Forced at last to increase the size of his abode, he proceeded to build an addition.

A passing neighbor noticed him at work on the enlargement and shouted an inquiry as to the meaning. And here was Dictionary Henry's reply:

"Well, I'm building a conditional on my house to make it more excommodious so I can treat my friends with greater hostility!"—Indianapolis News.

LIVE STOCK

FEED WHEAT TO FARM ANIMALS

Experiments Made by Twenty-Five Stations.

Bulletin No. 2 of the federal farm board, entitled "Practical Experiences in Feeding Wheat," contains the results of experiments by twenty-five college stations in feeding wheat to live stock and is the latest authentic information on the subject.

Most of the experiments were made recently, but it is an interesting fact that as early as 1894 the South Dakota experiment station published the results of some feeding trials which showed that wheat was about equal to corn as a feed for hogs. In the winter of 1901-02, the agricultural experiment station of the University of Nebraska conducted a test to determine the comparative feeding value of wheat and corn for cattle. The result of that experiment was that wheat had a feeding value of about 5 per cent greater than corn.

Recent experiences of stations and farmers in feeding wheat to hogs give it a value of from $1.25 to $1.07 per bushel and in all such experiments it was shown that wheat has a value equal or slightly greater than corn.

The showing with cattle and sheep was not quite so good, but with poultry it was equally favorable.

The bulletin, based upon all experiments, suggests that wheat and corn appear to be practically interchangeable in live stock rations and it depends upon the relative price as to which one would be the more profitable to feed.

Color is given Bulletin No. 2 by a statement that former President Coolidge eats wheat regularly for breakfast. His formula is "two parts of wheat and one of rye. It is cooked whole, without grinding. The grain is just as it comes from the field and is put in a double boiler and cooked until the kernels of wheat burst open. This sometimes takes four or five hours."

Raise More Horses for Efficient Farm Power

Will consumption of milk and bread and meat stand still?

The time is not far distant when it will, declares Wayne Dinamore, secretary of the Horse Association of America, in a recently issued statement, "Childless Marriages—Fewer Mouths for the Farmer to Feed."

Farmers must realize, Mr. Dinamore says, that a wise alternative is to raise and feed some live stock not intended for human consumption but for saving them in their farm operations as efficient, cheaply kept farm power—good, sound horses and mules, in other words. Used in big teams, they are the best, most efficient form of power for the farm; and, kept on pasture as they should be, they cause the owner almost no cash expense. Anyone desiring a copy of the statement in full may have it by writing to Wayne Dinamore, secretary, Horse Association of America, Union Stock Yards, Chicago.

Wheat Fed Live Stock to Relieve Situation

Every one is agreed that the price of wheat next year must depend to a large extent on whether or not the present surplus is taken off the market to be used as live stock feed. It is also a well-known fact that shortage in corn amounts to as much or more than the surplus of wheat and small grain.

In this connection it is interesting to note that in 1923, when a somewhat similar condition presented itself, there was 140,000,000 bushels of wheat used on farms primarily for live stock feed. In 1927, when the next highest year, 85,000,000 bushels were used for that purpose. For the good of both the live stock industry and the wheat producer, it is to be hoped that considerably more wheat will be fed this year than either one of the two previously high years.

Beef Breeding Herd

The advantages of crossing good beef bulls on grade dairy cows, where the owner does not care to grade up his dairy herd, are numerous. The calves so produced will sell higher as veal calves. They may be fed out and sold as fat steers or heifers, thus utilizing some of the cheaper roughage and pastures. The heifers may be retained and bred back to a good sire as mentioned, thus establishing a grade beef breeding herd at little cost. Such a herd will produce market toppling steers.

Gains on Lambs

Lambs are very efficient utilizers of feeds. Four pounds of corn and five pounds of alfalfa or clover hay will produce a pound of gain on a lamb. When corn is available at 1 cent per pound and hay at approximately 1/2 cent per pound, there should be a comfortable margin for the feeder who receives 9 to 10 cents for lambs. When feed prices are higher, one can easily calculate the cost of producing 100 pounds of gain and determine whether it would be policy to enter the game.

FEEL MEAN?

Don't be helpless when you suddenly get a headache. Reach in your pocket for immediate relief. If you haven't any Bayer Aspirin with you, get some at the first drugstore you come to. Take a tablet or two and be rid of the pain. Take promptly. Nothing is gained by waiting to see if the pain will leave of its own accord. It may grow worse! Why postpone relief?

There are many times when

Bayer Aspirin will "save the day." It will always ease a throbbing head. Quiet a grumbling tooth. Relieve nagging pains of neuralgia or neuritis. Check a sudden cold. Even rheumatism has lost its terrors for those who have learned to depend on these tablets.

Gargle with Bayer Aspirin at the first suspicion of sore throat, and reduce the infection. Look for Bayer on the box—and the word Genuine in red. Genuine Bayer Aspirin does not depress the heart.

Italian Peasants Fight Army of Deadly Snakes

Sturdy old farmers of Udine, Italy, watch out where they do their promenade these days following the dispersion of the snake jamboree, which was held in the courtyard of a farmhouse beneath the protective cloak of a huge haystack.

Several women were removing the hay when hundreds of vipers—Italy's only poisonous snakes—began to ooze their way out from underneath the pile. Doors were slammed and peasants armed with spades and scythes went to war. They had killed about 50 vipers when a six-footadder snake with a pair of sparkling eyes crawled over the top and charged the enemy.

The women opened the barred house doors for their men this time. Later on in the day the peasants again attacked the haystack, but meanwhile the visiting snakes had departed, leaving the dead unbused on the field of action.

Wakeful restless CHILD needs Castoria

WE can never be sure just what makes an infant restless, but the remedy can always be the same. Good old Castoria! There's comfort in every drop of this pure vegetable preparation, and not the slightest harm in its frequent use. As often as Baby has a fretful spell, is feverish, or cries and can't sleep, let Castoria soothe and quiet him. Sometimes it's a touch of colic. Other times it's constipation. Or diarrhea—a condition that should always be checked promptly. Just keep Castoria handy, and give it promptly. Relief will follow very promptly; if it doesn't you should call a physician.

All through babyhood, Castoria should be a mother's standby; and a wise mother continues it in more liberal doses as a child grows up.

Readily obtained at any drugstore, the genuine easily identified by the Chas. H. Fletcher signature and the name Castoria on the wrapper like this:

The language most widely used for commercial transactions all over the world is English. A recent British educational commission designated the language of commerce other than English in the following order of importance: French, German, Italian, Spanish unquestionably the most important foreign language for citizens of the United States. It depends, however, chiefly upon the nature of business in which one is engaged. French and Spanish are probably the most important foreign commercial languages for America. The importance of German will depend to a large extent upon the future position of that country in the commercial world.

JESUS THE GREAT PHYSICIAN

LESSON TEXT—Luke 4:33-44; 5:12-18, 19-26.
GOLDEN TEXT—Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows; yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus and Health.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus and Health.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Our Friend and Helper.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Christian Ministry to Physical Ills.

I. Jesus Healing a Demoniac (4:33-37).

While engaged in teaching in the synagogue, Jesus was interrupted by a man who had a "spirit of an unclean devil," who cried out with a loud voice asking that he be left alone, professing knowledge of him as the Holy One of God. Jesus rebuked the demon and compelled him to come out of the man.

At the command of Jesus the demon came out of the man with a violent struggle. This healing shows Jesus not only gracious but powerful to set free men who are under the power of the Devil, and also his ability to free men from the whole brood of diabolical passions such as lust, envy, anger, and jealousy which rule them. This manifestation of divine power amazed the people, causing them to cry out, "What a word is this!"

II. Jesus Heals Peter's Mother-in-Law of a Great Fever (vv. 38-41).

This woman was prostrate with a great fever. They of Peter's household besought Jesus in her behalf. He rebuked the fever and it left her so that she immediately arose and ministered unto them. No earthly physician has ever been known to heal in that way. Divine healing is immediate and complete. It is most important that we distinguish between divine healing and faith healing. Faith healing is the result of the action of the mind upon the body, and is measured by the degree of the faith of the individual, while divine healing is the action of the power of God upon the diseased one and is always complete and immediate.

As a result of this manifestation of divine power, the fame of Jesus spread abroad and many sick of divers diseases were brought unto him and he healed them all.

III. Jesus Heals a Leper (5:12-15).

Leprosy was a most loathsome and terrible disease. Because of its foulness, one afflicted therewith was an outcast. Leprosy was incurable by man, therefore, the leper was regarded as hopeless and dead. In response to the leper's earnest request Jesus touched him and bade the leprosy to depart, and immediately he was healed and cleansed. Leprosy is a type of sin. Though sin is loathsome, hideous and separating, Jesus has power to save those who come to him by faith.

IV. Jesus Heals a Paralytic (5:18-20).

1. Watched by the Pharisees and doctors of the law (v. 17). The spreading abroad of Jesus' fame only incited jealousy on the part of these men. They did not want to get too close to him, but close enough to know what was going on.

2. The paralytic brought to Jesus (vv. 18, 19). This is a fine lesson of Christian service. They could not heal the man, but being moved by sympathy they co-operated in bringing him to Jesus who could heal and restore. Their efforts in bringing the man show their willingness to go to pains and trouble to bring the needy man to Jesus.

3. The man's sins forgiven (v. 20). Jesus looked back of the palsy to its cause—sin. The effect of his sin was before Jesus, but he proceeded to deal with the cause of it. All disease and death are the result of sin. The Lord deals first with that which was at the root of the trouble. Jesus saw the faith not only of those who brought him but of the man himself.

4. The purpose of miracles (vv. 21, 22). The Pharisees accused Christ of blasphemy when he declared the man's sins forgiven. Jesus showed them that back of the beneficent deed to the man was the demonstration of his deity. The main purpose in the working of miracles is the authentication of the divine mission of the one performing them. While the divine power and authority are thus shown, the wisdom and love of God are shown in that in all cases the supernatural work is for the good of the individual.

5. The relative value of physical ill and moral and spiritual maladies (vv. 23, 24). Physical ill are less serious than the sins which cause them.

NOTICE OF THE FILING OF A PETITION FOR AN IMPROVED GRAVEL ROAD IN FRANKLIN AND WILMINGTON TOWNSHIP, DEKALB COUNTY, INDIANA

Notice is hereby given to the property owners of Franklin and Wilmington Townships, DeKalb County, Indiana, and to all others concerned, that there was filed in the office of the Auditor of DeKalb County, Indiana, on the 8th day of January, 1931, a petition for the construction of an improved gravel road in Franklin and Wilmington Townships, DeKalb County, Indiana, the beginning of the route and terminus of said road, the materials to be used, the width of the road and a general description of the same being set out in the petition in words and figures as follows, to-wit:

State of Indiana,
County of DeKalb, ss:
Before the Board of Commissioners of DeKalb County, Indiana
In the Matter of the Petition by William Fetter, et al. for a Free Improved Gravel Road on the Township line between Franklin and Wilmington Townships, DeKalb County, Indiana
To the Honorable Board of Commissioners of DeKalb County, Indiana:

The undersigned, being more than fifty (50) adult freeholders and voters of Franklin and Wilmington Townships, both in DeKalb County, Indiana, of which at least ten are from each of the said townships, do hereby petition your Honorable Board that the following described highway, to-wit:

Beginning at a point on the township line between Franklin and Wilmington Townships, DeKalb County, Indiana on the section line between section three (3) in Wilmington Township and Section thirty-four (34) in Franklin Township where the Butler-Hamilton road intersects said township line and running thence west approximately one and three quarters miles on said township line to a point 1000 feet east of the north-west corner of Section Four (4) in Wilmington Township and there to end, shall be constructed, established and improved by the construction of a turnpike gravel road over the entire route of the road described.

Your petitioners would further show to the Board that the said proposed highway runs on its entire length on a township line and that it connects at its east terminus with the Cloyd Snyder Highway, a part of the county road system of DeKalb County and that it also intersects with the Butler-Hamilton Road, also a part of the county highway system of DeKalb County.

Your petitioners further say that they recommend that the grade of the said proposed road be twenty-four (24) feet in width and that the said highway to twelve (12) feet in width and that the same be improved by placing gravel thereon to the depth of ten inches and that the said highway shall be sufficiently graded and drained before placing thereon the materials for the said improvement.

Your petitioners further say that there is a necessity of the improvement of said road for the following reasons:

1. That the said is a township line road and it is now a poor road and will be for public utility when completed and that the benefits derived therefrom will exceed the cost of construction.

2. That the present system of maintaining and keeping up said road is a failure and inadequate to keep the road in condition for travel.

3. That the said highway is a part of a United States Mail Route.

4. That the most practical way to build said roads and to keep it in repair is to construct it under the laws of the State of Indiana, relating to the construction of highways on township lines, so that the same may become a part of the gravel road system of DeKalb County, Indiana and be maintained by the said DeKalb County, Indiana.

That the aforesaid road when completed will be approximately one and three quarters miles in length.

Wherefore your petitioners pray your Honorable Board that the said highway described herein be established and improved by grading, draining and graveling as a turnpike gravel road in accordance with the laws of the State of Indiana relating to the construction of highways on township line roads.

The death of Mrs. Alice Simanton of Auburn, occurred Sunday night and the funeral was held from the home Wednesday at 2 o'clock. Rev. Fred Thomas officiating. E. R. Kinsey had charge of the burial.

The Farmers Institute will be held February 3rd and 4th in the Newville U. B. Church. On the 5th and 6th, the same week will be held the Sunday School Convention in the St. Joe Lutheran Church. Extensive plans are being made for both meetings. Don't forget the dates.

Upon application of Edward Scott, the Knisely Bros. & Co. bank of Butler, has been appointed in the DeKalb circuit court as administrator of the estate of the late James E. Scott, who died at Butler last May 15. The heirs are four sons, Edward and Arnold Scott of Butler, Olin Scott of Alliance, O. and Carl Scott of Cleveland O. There is no estate, but the purpose of an administrator is to attempt to collect damages for Mr. Scott's death.

Howard Shilling reports having witnessed three accidents in one evening, while attending market at Fort Wayne Saturday and on his return home. Merwood Rhodes was run down by a car, when he attempted to cross the street with a basket of potatoes on his shoulder. He was badly bruised up but was cared for by the doctor immediately. The second one happened in Fort Wayne, just as he was passing through the viaduct. A car skidded and hit the curb, bounding back and crossing the entire street and hitting the opposite curb. The lady driver was injured considerably, and the third one was on the Tonkle road, where the two Garrett men were killed.

THE STORY

Returning to London, practically penniless, after an unsuccessful business trip, Sir George Sandison takes dinner with his widowed stepmother, his old nurse, Aggy. He did not approve of her marriage to his father, but her explanation satisfies him. Little is left of the estate, and Lady Sandison proposes that they go to the United States to visit her brother, Robert MacBeth, wealthy contractor. Sir George agrees. MacBeth lives on an island estate with his daughter, Roberta, who longed for city life. MacBeth is a victim of arthritis and almost helpless. MacBeth is glad to see his sister and asks the two to stay. Roberta is keeping a date with Jack Navarro, about whom she knows little. MacBeth arranges for his sister to take charge of the household and George to act as secretary.

CHAPTER III—Continued

"You're a wonder, Aggy," declared her brother, looking at the toast. "I've been offering Sir George the post of secretary, private secretary, a sort of liaison officer between me, in my crippled state here, and my New York office. I have a secretary there, but I want him at the office. I need a man who can go to the city and get things done for me and at the same time take a look outside at the various jobs, and come here and give me an idea as to whether my plans are being carried out or not."

Lady Sandison looked at him and nodded approval. "You have done well to take Sir George here. Have a bit of toast, Rob, and let me put jam on it. It will set you up. And to think you two have planned it out all yourselves, without any help!" She looked at them both admiringly.

Sir George returned the look warily. He knew his Aggy of old, but her brother smiled broadly. It was warming to him to find how much he liked Aggy again. Despite her handicap, and poverty, her lack of family—had she not contrived to marry a baronet! Robert MacBeth might think that titles meant nothing to him, but Aggy's title and Sir George's presence in his house were a source of pride.

"While we're sipping our tea," said Lady Sandison, comfortably aware that Sir George was admiring her, "you'll maybe be able to tell me, Rob, where Sir George will hide, and how late does your daughter generally stay out when there's dinner to get and some to get it?"

Robert MacBeth looked worried. "She ought to be home. We quarreled, of course, this morning, but I hardly thought she'd leave me alone so long."

"Something by-ordinary's detained her," declared Aggy. Ever since she had glimpsed Roberta this morning, she had had her mind made up about that young lady, but she was not telling Robert's father. "Don't put yourself out, Rob. She's no run away. She'll be home soon."

"Oh, do you think so, Aggy? You're a great comfort," then he turned to Sir George. "I'd like you to stay here, Sir George, if it suits you. It will be best for me, and there's plenty of room."

Sir George, looking like an embarrassed Apollo, thanked him. He was thinking rapidly that never had his luck been greater than now that Aggy had taken the helm.

"Afore your daughter gets back," resumed Aggy, watching first one then the other, but evidently satisfied in her own mind that they were all getting along nicely, "are we to use our titles here, or put them by, as you might say, until we go home again?"

Robert MacBeth looked puzzled. He had forgotten that Roberta knew nothing about this aunt, except that she was a poor and obstinate Scotch woman, who foolishly refused the money he had offered. How would she take this new element he was introducing into his home? Would Roberta see her aunt's real worth or only her odd ways and clothes and queer modes of expression?

"If I could only keep it from her," muttered Robert MacBeth, "I might try it as an experiment."

"I wouldn't," declared Sir George quickly. "It's hardly fair. If we're to be in the house, she should know all about us, I think, sir."

"It would be a grand lesson to her if we kept it from her," declared her Aunt Aggy.

"Roberta isn't that kind," retorted her father indignantly. "She's not a snob. She's just a naughty child."

Sir George put up his hand for silence and rose, but before he could speak the door was flung open.

"Hello, Dad!" Roberta called. "What's happened? No lights in the garage. No sign of Willy. No one in the kitchen. Where are the maids?"

"They went away with Willy, as soon as your back was turned," her father told her. "Didn't you expect it?"

"I did not." The slipper Robert's eyes rested for just a moment on the conspicuously handsome young man who happened to be standing near her father's chair. She bent over her father and said in a voice that though low, reached Sir George: "What's Phoebe Apollo, or is it Adonia, doing here?"

Then before her father could prevent her, she turned to Sir George. "It isn't, of course, included in the regular duties of a butler but still in an emergency—if you would put my car in the garage for me—"

Lady Sandison took a quick step forward, but Sir George was before her. "Delighted to be of use," he said, and crossed the room toward the door.

"Glad you take pleasure in your work," Roberta called in low velvet voice that played havoc with most men, halting him as he reached the door. "In this place you will find it includes a little of everything, out doors and indoors, but we pay well. Have you arranged the terms, Father?"

"My dear," said Robert MacBeth quietly, wondering what effect this would have on the girl, "this gentleman is my private secretary and his salary will hardly interest you."

"Did You Bring the Braw Lad Over to Marry American Dollars, Aunt?"

"Private secretary!" repeated Roberta, the blood mounting to her cheeks. She looked at the receding back of the man whom she had so cavalierly set to work. "Well, I can apologize later, if necessary."

She looked from the tray to Lady Sandison. "Is that the best you can do?"

Quickly Robert MacBeth spoke, with an appealing look at Aggy.

"This is my sister, your Aunt Aggy, and she has kindly consented to help us out. Since you so strongly object to the difficulties of housekeeping, I've installed her as housekeeper."

"Aunt—Aunt Aggy!" Roberta, who had been free all her life from the encumbrance of relatives, stared at this aunt who had come from across the seas unbidden, unannounced.

"How do you do, my dear?" said Lady Sandison, and she stepped forward.

Roberta drew back a little, her eyes sparkling angrily. She gave her father, who had outwitted her in the first move of their difficult game, a quick glance before she could control her voice sufficiently to say, pleasantly: "How do you do, Aunt? This is a great surprise."

"To me, too," Robert MacBeth said smoothly watching his daughter, "and a very welcome surprise to both of us, Aggy."

"We'll talk about that later," declared his sister, regarding her niece with great friendliness. "If you'll step into the kitchen with me, my dear, we'll maybe get some kind of meal together, and tomorrow there'll be a cook and maids here. Your father said you expected them to-morrow."

"I—I'd rather help the secretary find his way about the garage," said Roberta airily, and turned to go.

The plump capable hand of Lady Sandison fell lightly, but compellingly on her niece's shoulder. "No need. Sir George can always find his way about."

"Sir George! Sir George—who?"

"Sir George Alan Edward Sandison," said her aunt smoothly, as she blocked her niece's way of escape, and gently steered her kitchenward. "Is it not wonderful that your father should draw into his service such a grand young man?"

Roberta looked at her warily. "What's your last name?" she asked.

"Sandison."

"He doesn't look a bit like you, Aunt—Aunt Aggy."

Mementoes of Famous Scotchman in Museum

James Watt, the famous mechanical inventor and civil engineer, was born at Greenock, Scotland, in 1736, and died in Birmingham, England in 1819. It is not generally known that the contents of his garret workshop are in the Science Museum at South Kensington. The garret was used by Watt in his house in Birmingham, and was shut up for thirty years after his death. Various descriptions of the opening of the garret, in 1833, are given in a pamphlet issued by the museum. Samuel Smiles, who was one of the party, recorded that "The ashes of the last fire were in the grate, the last bit of coal was in the scuttle. . . . Many objects lay

"Indeed, no! How could he? I'm only his stepmother. He's the living image of my late husband, Sir Stephen Sandison of Sandisbree." The little lost nothing from Lady Sandison's announcement.

Her niece stood spellbound in the doorway looking at her. This dumpy little woman, whom she had thought must be cook-housekeeper, who was indeed the housekeeper now by her father's authority, what did she mean by posing off titles like that? "Who are you?"

"Your father's sister," said Aggy with quiet composure, "and also Lady Sandison."

Roberta looked from her aunt to her father. Her father nodded. Without a word Roberta took the tray and went out of the room.

"I've taken the first trick," declared Robert MacBeth, sticking back among the pillows.

Aggy looked at him, closed her lips, nodded, and went towards the kitchen. As the door between the kitchen and the hall closed, Roberta turned questioning to her aunt. Lady Sandison smiled at her.

"Rob's my brother and your father so we'll no quarrel, but we'll not be tyrannized over neither."

"Let's get this straight," Roberta said. "Are you on my side or father's?"

"Both, and if you'll follow my advice you'll give in to him. Humor him and he's yours, and surely Rob's very easy to humor. You made a mistake in managing him today. You told him what you were going to do before you did it."

Roberta turned on her angrily. She was not to be so easily managed. "If you take my place here, you take my place without any aid of mine."

Her aunt surveyed her calmly. "It's war is it?"

Roberta nodded.

"Well the sooner that's understood the better. We'll just get the supper. Show me where the potatoes are, Roberta, and keep a civil tongue in Rob's hands and mine."

Roberta considered herself a match for any woman. She fired her first shot.

"Did you bring the braw lad over to marry American dollars, Aunt?" She asked it in her most honeyed tone.

"And did you have me in your mind at the time?"

Slowly her aunt counted potatoes and began to wash them at the sink.

"I thought I was taking a risk bringing my bonnie lad over here, but I said to myself, at least Roberta would have her head screwed on, and would know enough to stand aside and give him his chance at some fine, rich girl. I gave you credit for the wit to see that though American dollars might be handy for Sandisbree, almost any other girl would have a better chance than the daughter of Rob MacBeth. Your father was a joiner and builder on the estate, and his father before him."

Roberta looked at her speechless, so angry that she dared not open her mouth.

"Aye, the money might better come from pills and poisons or groceries. The gentry would swallow it and a stranger in Sandisbree easier than they would Rob's daughter."

"Leave me out of it," Roberta flamed. "Don't you think for a moment, I'll—"

"So far from it," her aunt declared vigorously, "that I'm just fair upset to see that you share the fatal weakness of the MacBeth family."

"What's that?" snapped Roberta, noting with surprise the professional manner in which Lady Sandison parried the potatoes.

"They're just slaves to beauty, the whole clanjamfry of them," declared her aunt solemnly, "and you're as bad as the rest. Watch what you're doing, lass! You're giggling that loaf something awful."

"This isn't Scotland where there's hard scrubbing to get bread—and a man," Roberta told her with scorn.

"Why there are heaps of good-looking men over here. Your Little Beauty isn't in danger."

"So you say," said her aunt. "Time will tell. It's as well, Roberta, not to boast until you've tried out your strength."

"Fudge! I'm not reduced to poor Scots my father has to find jobs for." She disregarded the sudden gasping look her aunt gave her, and continued, emphasizing her point with the bread knife. "He's good-looking enough to make some girls lose their heads but I'm my father's daughter to this extent that the man who tries to make an impression on me will have to have something more than an angel face, big eyes, pretty hair and stand six feet."

"Six feet three." From the doorway Sir George gravely corrected her. "Your sentiments are mine, Miss MacBeth. Let's stick to them."

The characters are: Dennis Hogan, an Irishman, Eugene Habig; Mary Hogan, his wife, Zora Titler; Donald, his son, Albert Habig; Marian, his daughter, Madie Essig; Patrick Lahey, his friend, Ralph Bartles; Tim Toolin, a close-fisted Irishman, William Essig; Jasper Lee, an ebony undertaker; Albert Yoder; Gaston Marcol, Marian's fiancé, Cloyd Titler; Lenore Schmidt, Donald's fiancée, Elsie Bartles; Mrs. O'Flaherty, a widow, Edith Yoder.

The different places this play will be given are: Jackson Center on Feb. 2; Butler Center on Feb. 3; Franklin Center on Feb. 5; West Richmond School House on Feb. 6; Wilmington Township on Feb. 9; Keyser Township on Feb. 10; Fairfield Township on Feb. 11; Union Township on Feb. 12.

TWENTY-EIGHT ESTATES CLOSED

During the last term of court twenty-eight estates were closed in which no inheritance tax was assessed and a number of them are of people well known to our readers, hence we print only those:

Mary E. Andrews estate: net value $2,919.87. Three children, Mine I. Seiler, Collin C. Andrews and Maude Catherine Andrews, $973.29 each.

Nancy C. Rummel estate: net value $2,314. Three children, Elizabeth Frederick, Louie Beam and Hulbert N. Rummel, $578.50 each; five grandchildren Fern, Francis, John, Grace and Owen W. Rummel Jr., $96.41 each.

Elijah Inhofe estate: net value $6,832.40. The widow, Mary E. Inhofe, $100. A son, Ora D. Inhofe, $3,144.13; two daughters, Ethel L. Armstrong and Sarah N. Wyatt, $1,294.13 each.

Philip D. Ginder estate: net value: $9,380.25. Nine children, Ines Snyder, Zantha Snyder, Florence Reinhardt, Frank I. Ginder, Zora Paul, Harry M. Ginder, Clyde D. Ginder, Grace Kelley and Jacob L. Ginder, $1,042.29 each.

Wm. H. Northrup estate: net value $6,383.96. A daughter, Pluma Hamilton, and a grandson, Curtis Northrup, $3,191.98 each.

Sarah Ellen Richmond estate: net value, $306.85. Three sons, Jesse M., Omo B. and Ivan W. Richmond, $76.71 each; eleven grandchildren, Arthur, Al, Jesse, Laura, Blanche and Frank Richmond, Oral Smith, Daisy Brown, Helen Goe, Ellen Barnes and Iva Sucher, $6.97 each.

OFFER PRIZE FOR OLDEST PIECE OF HOME FURNITURE

Have you a mohair-covered chair or sofa in your home? If so, you may be two hundred and fifty dollars the richer for it! The News is in receipt of a message from the Household Science Institute, Chicago, asking for help in locating the oldest piece of mohair-upholstered furniture in the United States. The Institute feels that there is a possibility of its being found in this section. The style of the sought for furniture or its use or non-use at the present time are not important, providing it is in good condition. The owner of the piece selected will be awarded two hundred fifty dollars and the piece itself will be exhibited with other old-time furniture during the World's Fair at Chicago in 1933.

BARN DOOR FALLS ON TWO YOUNGSTERS

Junior Tustison, son of Mr. and Mrs. George Tustison, is laid up with a broken hip, as the result of a barn door falling on him Saturday forenoon.

Junior and his pal, Calvin Hull, son of Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Hull, neighbor boys living in Hamburg, north of the B. & O. tracks, were playing about the Tustison barn, when Mrs. Tustison heard both boys screaming. When she found them at the barn, the big barn door was on top of the youngsters and her son was injured as above stated, while Cal was only frightened.

It seems that the boys were making the door slam by taking hold of the bottom, pulling out and letting it slam against the barn, anyway, the door jumped off the track and fell on both the boys.

When found Junior was under the door and Cal was under head and shoulder. A board being off the door saved him from injury. Dr. Shook was called immediately and set the leg for Junior and he seems to be getting along. The boys are both past three years old.

DEFINITION OF EDIBLE GELATIN

Edible gelatin is a hard, tasteless, odorless substance which is almost white when dry and transparent or translucent in solution. Gelatin is a protein food of high nutritive value.

It is extracted by heat from the bones, white connective tissue, and skins of food animals.

The chief distinguishing characteristic of gelatin is its ability to form jelly after being dissolved in hot water and allowed to stand. Other characteristics are:

1. It is a colloid and, therefore, tends to prevent the growth of crystals in any medium in which it is present.

2. It is an emulsifier and helps to hold in union two liquids that would otherwise separate.

3. It aids in the digestion of other foods.

The chief uses of gelatin are in desserts, ice cream, marshmallows, and jellied meats.

DO PEOPLE READ THE ADVERTISEMENTS?

Often merchants wonder if people read their ads; sometimes they tell us they don't know if it pays them to advertise. We often are convinced it does pay to advertise and that people do read the ads. Week before last one of our loyal subscribers inquired why we didn't have more local advertising, then he mentioned the loyalty of the merchants in another town to their home paper in the way of advertising. He said he always looked for ads of local merchants in our paper. We be-

A "NATIVE" RECIPE FOR LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY

Since "Honest Abe" was a man of the soil, plain foods are most suitable to serve on his birthday. What more appropriate than a dish composed of a native Illinois product, the state where Lincoln spent much of his life, made with a recipe from his native state, Kentucky?

Corn Bread Kentucky
1 cup flour, 1 cup cornmeal, 4 tps. baking powder, 1 cup milk, 2 tps. shortening, 2 tps. salt, 3 tps. dark corn syrup, 1 egg, 1/2 cup shredded cocoanut.

Mix dry ingredients, blend in shortening, add egg, milk and syrup. Add cocoanut. Beat thoroughly and bake in shallow pan in not oven about 25 minutes (425 degrees F.) When done remove from pan, cut in squares, sprinkle a bit of toasted cocoanut on top each section and serve quite hot. The corn bread may also be baked in "logs" to represent the rails split in the early days of the President's career.

Here there are a great number of our subscribers who look to this paper to bring them news of the local merchants, when they fail to see them they are disappointed and no doubt go to another town to shop as did this subscriber mentioned above.

Your support of your local paper is a reflection of the enterprise on the part of the merchants. A town whose business firms are afraid to advertise is one place many persons shun. Broadcast your enthusiasm about your lines of merchandise, tell your customers what you are selling and what the price. A shopper likes to do business with an advertising merchant. This town has as fine stores, and sells merchandise as cheap or cheaper and has as good merchants as any other trading center and folks like to come here to trade, but they are attracted to other towns because the merchants there tell them of their merchandise, and what it can be purchased for. The shoppers are not going to come to town to read the lettering painted on the windows—they want to know before they come, or they will go elsewhere. Windows were not made for billboards, they were built for displaying of goods.

SHANK ACCUSED OF STEALING AUTO

Olan Shank, 21, living four miles north of St. Joe, was taken to Fort Wayne Thursday afternoon by federal officers to answer to a charge of violating the Dyer act.

Shank was accused of stealing a Ford car belonging to Eugene Prickett of Auburn, last November. He is said to have driven the car to Fort Wayne, where he was joined by two girls, and then took them to Jackson, Mich. He left them there and they proceeded in the car to Detroit, where they were arrested.

The girls are reported to have said at Detroit that a youth whom they knew only as "Chick" had furnished them with the stolen car and the federal officers traced the clue to Shank, who is known by that nickname. Shank admitted when arrested that he knew the girls but denied knowledge of the theft.

The arrest was made at Shank's home Wednesday afternoon by W. P. Sealdien of the department of justice, who was accompanied by Deputy Sheriff Herbert N. Grimm. Shank was held in the DeKalb county jail until Thursday, when he was taken to Fort Wayne by Officer Sealdien and Deputy United States Marshal Atkins.

Shank was sentenced to the reformatory a few years ago for chicken stealing. He escaped from the institution, but was recaptured in Garrett and he served a total of three years, when he was paroled.

If you have to eat your own words they will digest more easily if they are pleasant ones.

Selecting Hangings for the Doorways

Hangings That Frame a Doorway With Pleasant Vista Beyond.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

In selecting hangings for doorways, some of the principles that apply to window curtains are also useful. For example, if the walls of the room are covered with figured wall paper, then the use of a plain fabric in a somewhat darker tone serves to relieve the severity of the door line and at the same time frame whatever view is glimpsed beyond it. In the picture shown, which was taken by the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture, the double doorway at the farther side of the dining room leads to a sun porch. A bit of the garden is seen from within the room. Leaving most of the door space open gives a vista as far as the other side of the porch, and adds to the impression of spaciousness in the room.

In this case dark green cotton velvet or velours, matching the rug, was chosen for the hangings. The figures in the wall paper are chiefly green in a lighter, but harmonizing shade. The furniture is of red mahogany—making a delightful scheme of furnishing for this room, in which the portieres play an important part. As it was not intended to draw them across the opening, they were hung on short rods, after being arranged in permanent french pleats, which are pleats in groups of three, pinched together and sewn in place.

Another good way of curtaining this doorway would have been to use a wooden pole with brass or wooden rings inside the frame of the door and

Crying Will Do the Baby No Harm

Always provided he is well and has no vicious pin jabbing his pink skin, let baby cry as he will. Many baby experts maintain it does him good. At the least, it will do him no harm.

And by the same token, says Dr. Philip Stimson, it is strictly up to the parents to see to it that crying does baby no good. When a vigorous howl invariably gets him lifted from bed and petted or walked, or even fed between the meals, no baby is so dumb as not to learn the system.

Parents who cannot determine whether the baby cry, his cry out, but feel that something must be done about it, are only laying up a pack of trouble for themselves, and not a little for the baby.

Crying will do him no harm; see that it does him no good, either.—The Farm Journal.

Too Much Food Not Good for Children

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

"Give small amounts of food at a time when serving little children," advises the specialist in child nutrition of the bureau of home economics, United States Department of Agriculture. "Even when they have learned to like a number of foods children are bewildered by too much variety at once. The very young child is a 'one-at-a-time' and gets along best when allowed to clear his plate of one or two foods before anything else is given him. Always serve children small enough portions so that they can finish the whole amount. Parents sometimes overestimate the capacity of the young child, and serve him so much that he is too discouraged to begin to eat, or that he cannot finish even though he makes a good start. If a child is unusually hungry, second helpings may be given."

The little girl in the picture is seated comfortably at her own little table, where her meals have been given from the time that she could first handle a spoon or fork. The joy of accomplishment became all-absorbing when she first learned to pour her milk without spilling out of her own little pitcher, into her tumbler, which was carefully chosen, to fit her tiny grasp. The meals are served on an old-fashioned dolly of gay pattern, the floor is washable, and she wears a large bib, so that if she spills a little food in the process of learning self-help, it just low enough for the rings to slide easily. The curtains could then be arranged as draw curtains by means of a cord with two pulleys, a double one at one end and a single one at the other. The bureau of home economics will be glad to explain how draw curtains are arranged.

Portieres or doorway hangings are usually lined, unless the material is decorative on both sides. The color of the lining may match or contrast with the right side of the curtain, but more important, it must harmonize with the color scheme of the room in which it is seen. The fabric may be of the same or lighter weight.

Some Food and Household Hints

By NELLIE MAXWELL

Success in housekeeping adds credit to the woman of intellect and a luster to a woman's accomplishments.

"The tender morsels on the palate melt. And all the force of cookery is felt."

Caramel is a favorite flavoring with a large majority of people. It is equally as good as a flavoring for meat sauces, soups and made dishes, as in desserts and ice cream. It may be quickly and easily prepared as follows:

Melt a cupful of granulated sugar slowly in a smooth omelet pan and cook until it becomes a rich brown, being careful to avoid scorching. Pour in a cupful of boiling water and stir until a thick syrup is formed. The caramel may be kept indefinitely if kept covered or bottled.

Ink stains on the fingers can be removed by rubbing with a cloth moistened with household ammonia. Rinse the hands in clear water afterwards.

Lemon juice and sunshine is an excellent remover of rust spots on linen or white fabrics.

When it is necessary to use boiled water for drinking it will taste better if it is poured back and forth from two pitchers, giving it more air.

Use a lump or two of sugar instead of starch when washing fine lace.

An easily prepared mushroom sauce which adds tremendously to the attractiveness of a broiled steak is prepared thus: Mix in a frying pan one tablespoonful each of butter and flour, stir in gradually one cupful of brown stock; when boiling point is reached add one cupful of mushrooms, salt and pepper to taste, a tablespoonful of mushroom catsup, with a teaspoonful of caramel.

When white stains on polished wood surfaces cannot be removed by a cloth dampened in alcohol, use powdered pumice mixed with linseed oil to make a thin paste. Rub over the spots until they disappear. Wipe off carefully with a soft cloth dampened with furniture polish.

A quick polish may be made for an occasion by chopping cooked beets with celery and cabbage and a tablespoonful or two of freshly grated horseradish root, sugar, salt and a little vinegar or lemon juice to taste.

One can do marvelous things with just a pickle. Cut into the thinnest of slices, spread in the form of a fan on a tasty sandwich it not only garnishes it but adds an appetizer as well.

Every hostess enjoys serving something a little out of the ordinary, and by observing the dainty things in homes and shops she may make her entertainments very much worth while. There can be nothing more gratifying to a hostess than to give pleasure to her friends.

Garnishes should be featured as much as possible. Not only are they appealing to the eye but they serve as appetizers and in many cases supply the body with mineral salts greatly needed.

Evening Fairy Tale for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

Mr. Hostain Bird was sitting on the limb of a tree, in the far off country where he lives.

Along walked Mrs. Lovely Bird, who had been so named because she was so beautiful and so lovely.

"Good morning," said Mrs. Lovely Bird politely.

"Good morning," said Mr. Hostain Bird calmly.

Just then Mrs. Hostain and the children joined Mr. Hostain on the branch of the tree and sat looking at Mrs. Lovely Bird.

They looked far from intelligent, and they didn't seem to notice what a lovely bird she was.

"Won't you tell me something of your life's history?" asked Mrs. Lovely Bird.

"What do you want to know?" asked Mr. Hostain.

"Well," said Mrs. Lovely Bird, "I've heard it said that you couldn't sing."

"Quite true," said Mr. Hostain, "we can't so much as warble."

"Indeed, isn't that sad," said Mrs. Lovely Bird, very sympathetically.

"I don't see why it is sad. We don't care whether we know how to sing or not."

"It makes not a particle of difference."

"But I've also heard it said that you could hardly fly at all," said Mrs. Lovely Bird.

"We can't. We're really hardly birds at all, but somehow they called us birds years and years ago because they couldn't think of anything else to call us."

Just then Mr. Hostain climbed to another limb, and he used his claws, neck and wings to get along.

"How queerly you do move," said Mrs. Lovely Bird. "You really creep like a snake."

"Did they ever think of calling you a snake?"

"Yes, they thought of it. I believe, but then we're not like the snakes because we cannot really crawl at all."

"Now some of the people who were calling or giving us a family name."

"I've also heard," said Mrs. Lovely Bird, "that your family were very hard hearted."

"It has been said that a member of your family could be shot down while sitting along side you on the limb of a tree and that the rest of you would not mind at all."

"True," said Mr. Hostain, "we're not wasting any of our time being fond of anyone."

"Strange, strange creatures," said Mrs. Lovely Bird. "And why do you live in those trees covered with thorns. They look so uncomfortable."

"Oh, no," said Mr. Hostain. "We don't mind them. We have our nests and we are quite contented."

"Nothing bothers us, nothing makes us particularly happy or sad or gay or gloomy."

"Strange, strange creatures," said Mrs. Lovely Bird again.

Serve Potatoes and Tomatoes New Way

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

When you are tired of serving the same old foods in the same old way, sometimes a very simple and easily made alteration will please everybody. Take such everyday foods as potatoes and onions and canned tomatoes—winter standbys, all of them. Any one of these alone ceases to be interesting after many repetitions. But just try cooking the potatoes in tomato juice instead of water, with a suggestion of onion flavoring—and you have a vegetable dish that might have been conceived by some famous chef. Or try baking a few onions in strained tomato juice, with a savory seasoning—and the result is a casserole dish worthy to be set before company. The bureau of home economics gives both recipes herewith:

Potatoes in Tomato Sauce.
1 quart potatoes, 2 cups strained sliced tomato juice
1 onion, sliced 2 tsp. salt
4 tbs. butter or oil Pepper or fat

Brown the potatoes and onions in the fat for twenty minutes, add the tomato juice, salt and pepper, cover, and simmer forty-five minutes, or until the potatoes are tender. The potatoes thicken the tomato juice so that no other thickening is necessary.

Baked Onions in Tomato Sauce.
4 medium-sized onions 2 cloves
1 quart canned tomato juice 2 tbs. flour
1 bay leaf 2 tbs. melted butter or other fat
1/2 tsp. salt 1/2 tsp. celery seed Dash of pepper

Skin the onions, cut in half, simmer in lightly salted boiling water for ten minutes, drain, and put in a large baking dish. Cook the tomatoes with the bay leaf, celery seed and cloves for ten minutes, and strain. Blend the flour and melted fat, add to the tomato juice with the salt and pepper, and mix well. Pour over the onions, cover, and cook until the onions are tender, about one hour. Serve from the baking dish.

Touch of Fur Effective on Print

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

The fur-trimmed idea is gaining. That a touch of fur is wondrously effective on gay sheer print is one of the proud discoveries made in the realm of fashion during the winter months and which because of its exceeding great charm holds promise of a widespread vogue for the future.

Be the dine or dance gown of sheer print or of heavier crepe it is almost certain to be styled with a matching jacket and in almost every instance the sleeves of the complementary jacket whether long or short or in bolero fashion are quite certain to be bordered with fur. Frequently the hemline of the jacket is also fur outlined.

Chiffon in a woodland pattern done in vivid colors on a black background is the chosen medium for the charming frock in the illustration. Wide fur borders the sleeves of its accompanying bolero. This winsome gown can be transformed into an evening formal simply by removing its short jacket, which is the way of most of the newer ensembles, the demand for a matching jacket having increased to such an extent that practically every frock has its accompanying jacket.

An exception to the gown with a jacket is the short-sleeved dress. This type also subscribes to the fur-trim idea in that the sleeves, which in some instances are not much more than caps and from then on vary to elbow length, are also bordered with fur.

For the evening mode the new prints are very gorgeous and for the most part patterned in large florals. This is in direct contrast to daytime prints which are conservative both as to their colorings which run largely to grays, beige and browns together with black and white. Navy as a background and especially with white promises to be in the lead.

Plaids, stripes and checks are the smart new note in prints both sheer and of firm weave. Sometimes the plaid is indicated merely by thin hairlines, then again the plaid design is worked in definite vivid colors and a third class is charmingly interpreted in "invisible" broken effects. These

Cold in Head, Chest or Throat?

RUB Musterole well into your chest and throat—almost instantly you feel easier. Repeat the Musterole-rub once an hour for five hours...

What a glorious relief! Those good old-fashioned cold remedies—oil of mustard, menthol, camphor—are mixed with other valuable ingredients in Musterole to make it what doctors call a "counter-irritant" because it gets action and is not just a salve.

It penetrates and stimulates blood circulation and helps to draw out infection and pain. Used by millions for 20 years. Recommended by many doctors and nurses. Keep Musterole handy—jars, tubes. All druggists.

To Mothers—Musterole is also made in milder form for babies and small children. Ask for Children's Musterole.

The fur-trimmed idea is gaining. That a touch of fur is wondrously effective on gay sheer print is one of the proud discoveries made in the realm of fashion during the winter months and which because of its exceeding great charm holds promise of a widespread vogue for the future.

Be the dine or dance gown of sheer print or of heavier crepe it is almost certain to be styled with a matching jacket and in almost every instance the sleeves of the complementary jacket whether long or short or in bolero fashion are quite certain to be bordered with fur. Frequently the hemline of the jacket is also fur outlined.

Chiffon in a woodland pattern done in vivid colors on a black background is the chosen medium for the charming frock in the illustration. Wide fur borders the sleeves of its accompanying bolero. This winsome gown can be transformed into an evening formal simply by removing its short jacket, which is the way of most of the newer ensembles, the demand for a matching jacket having increased to such an extent that practically every frock has its accompanying jacket.

An exception to the gown with a jacket is the short-sleeved dress. This type also subscribes to the fur-trim idea in that the sleeves, which in some instances are not much more than caps and from then on vary to elbow length, are also bordered with fur.

For the evening mode the new prints are very gorgeous and for the most part patterned in large florals. This is in direct contrast to daytime prints which are conservative both as to their colorings which run largely to grays, beige and browns together with black and white. Navy as a background and especially with white promises to be in the lead.

Plaids, stripes and checks are the smart new note in prints both sheer and of firm weave. Sometimes the plaid is indicated merely by thin hairlines, then again the plaid design is worked in definite vivid colors and a third class is charmingly interpreted in "invisible" broken effects. These plaid chiffons and crepes are welcomed with enthusiasm as they offer something so entirely different from what we have been having in prints.

The SANDMAN STORY

BOY WHO LOVED TRAINS

DANNY was sitting upon the floor, building a huge house out of blocks when he heard a train whistle. With a jump he was up, the blocks were knocked over, and he rushed across the room, climbed right over his mother's lap and was looking out of the window.

Nothing in this world was so important to Danny as a train.

He had been on trains three times, too. Three different times he had taken trips with his mother and his father. And the last two times his little sister Elaine had gone along, too.

By Going to the Window He Could See the Smoke.

The first time Elaine had not gone, because she had not yet arrived in the world.

But even though he had been on trains, he jumped up every time he heard the whistle in the distance. Then he could see from his window the smoke curling up from the engine, and he could hear the noise of the train.

He couldn't see the train from the house, but by going to the window he could see the smoke and he could hear it better, he felt quite sure, by being a little closer to it.

When he had traveled on trains he had gone with his daddy down to look at the big engine when the train was stopping any place for any length of time.

Sometimes it stopped for just a moment or two, and no one got out. Some people complained of the train and said it made so many stops, but Danny couldn't understand such people.

They had talked to the engine driver. He was sitting up in the engine looking out of the funny little side window—or opening. Danny wasn't quite sure what it should be called, and when he said to the engine driver: "Do you call that a window?" the engine driver had said:

"Call it anything you like, young fellow. You won't be hurting my feelings."

The engine driver had told him about the lights and the signals and what trains they would pass and how the locals stopped along the line to pick up the people who were only going short distances.

The engine driver had told him many things, and Danny felt as though, with a little more help, he could almost run the train himself.

In fact, the engine driver had said: "Why, you're learning in no time at all, all about it. I wouldn't be surprised to hear you were running a train before many years are past."

Danny thought it would be sooner than that.

Elaine hadn't taken the least interest in trains. She had sat inside in her mother's lap and hadn't wanted to go out at all.

But then she was only a little girl. But he loved Elaine. There was that time when his mother and daddy had gone to a party, and a lady had come in to stay with them. Elaine had not liked the strange lady and had cried when she came into the nursery. So Danny had told the lady that he would look after Elaine, and he had promised her just loads of candy and ice cream as soon as he got some money, and he had rocked her a little so she had fallen to sleep.

Still he had cried a little at seeing Elaine cry. He was very, very devoted to Elaine.

Only she didn't care much for trains. That he couldn't quite understand. He went back to his blocks when the train had gone by, and somehow he didn't build a house this time. He started in building a freight yard in which he put his trains. That was the best idea he had had yet.

The very, very best.

TREASURE ISLAND

THERE came, one day, plodding to the door of the Admiral Bechew inn, an old brown seaman. He was a "tall, strong, heavy, but brown man, his tarry pigtail falling over the shoulders of his soiled blue coat." He whistled the song, "Fifteen men on a dead man's chest, Yo-ho-ho and a bottle of rum."

In the attic of this old inn was a sea chest, the property of the seaman.

He brought it with him on the day he arrived at the inn. The chest contained, among other things, an important packet which contained instructions for finding a long-lost treasure buried many years ago. This oldskin packet was captured and surrendered to a Doctor Livesey who fitted out a ship in Bristol, and taking with him two trusted friends and a large crew to care for the ship, went in search of the lost treasure.

The crew on board the ship determined upon mutiny, plans for which were overheard by Jim Hawkins, one of the trusted friends, as he listened to a conversation on a moonlit night when he was safely hidden in an old apple barrel.

The searching party at last arrived upon the island where was buried the long-lost treasure. Of the twenty-six men on board, however, they were able to rely only on seven for loyalty and support. Thus handicapped, Jim Hawkins began his explorations. His eyes instinctively turned in the direction of a noise. Here he saw "a figure leap with great rapidity behind the trunk of a tree. What it was, whether bear, or man or monkey, I could in no wise tell. It seemed dark and shaggy; more I knew not." The mysterious figure was Ben Gunn, who had been marooned on the island for these three years and had lived on goats, berries and oysters.

It was Ben Gunn who was with the captain of an old ship when he had buried the treasure many years ago. Thus Ben Gunn became a member of the searching party. It was not difficult for him to lead the group to the lost treasure, for he himself had discovered it and hid it in a cave two months before the arrival of the party upon the island. The cave was at last entered and there lay great heaps of coin and bars of pure gold. The cruise homeward was successful. Only five men, however, of the original crew returned. All had an ample share of the treasure. Searching for hidden treasure is an interesting sport. . . . The treasure of the heart are hidden in our friends. They must be searched for. Gold in the heart is better than gold in the hand.

Worrying Chief Cause of Mental Breakdown

Nearly everybody, says Dr. Horatio M. Pollock, director of the statistical bureau of the New York state department of mental hygiene, has a mental breaking point somewhere; if physical or mental stresses reach that point almost any of us is likely to give way. There is, however, little need for the generality to worry unduly about this, for Doctor Pollock says that 955 out of every 1,000 persons born in New York state will probably manage to escape all forms of mental disease.

Persons with well-adjusted minds who rarely get angry or excited or agitated or show undue emotion in any form apparently have the best chance to escape. Somewhat less fortunate are those who have fairly well-adjusted minds, but who take their triumphs or losses at bridge or in the stock market too emotionally. Doctor Pollock speaks with less assurance of two other types of individuals—those mentally so out of adjustment that they are jealous, quarrelsome, faultfinding and suspicious of everybody who does not agree with them and those who go to pieces in unusual circumstances for want of courage and mental and physical stamina.

Mental diseases is of many causes and of many kinds. It may come from bodily injury or deterioration. Fortunately, many forms can be prevented by judicious attention to the body's health. The department of mental hygiene is engaged in a study of all the means of prevention.

Persons in normal health appear to be reasonably safe from mental breakdown so long as they take proper care of themselves. Most persons do more worrying than there is need for.—New York Sun.

World Growing Warmer, But by Slow Degrees

According to Dr. J. W. Humphreys, a famous physicist and weather expert, the trend is toward a hotter earth; but the warming-up process is so slow there is no cause for fearing the heat will torture this generation or several to come. In fact, Doctor Humphreys says, next summer, may be delightfully cool. The evidence is that glaciers in all parts of the world have been on the average slowly retreating since the culmination of the ice age, and they are still slowly retreating. We are quite aware that the ice sheet left Stockholm, Sweden, about 9,000 years ago and left Niagara falls about 25,000 or 30,000 years ago. The process of heat increase in Great Britain and the rest of the world is nothing to get excited about, Doctor Humphreys says. There always will be temporary surges of high or low temperatures for a season, for a year or for a period of years, but the average over any consecutive period of twenty years is practically the same as over any other twenty consecutive years of which there is official record.—Montreal Family Herald.

Build Windmill Air Taxi

Equipped with revolving wings so that it may rise or descend almost vertically, a new air taxi is being constructed in Britain. It will carry four passengers and its 400-horse power motor will drive it at a speed of 130 miles an hour. Instead of the usual fixed wings it will have four revolving planes like a huge propeller. The inventor believes it can land or start from any flat-roofed building.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"THE GAME IS NOT WORTH THE CANDLE"

WE HAVE here a colorful phrase, one which is current on everybody's lips and which is universally used to convey the idea of attempting something, which, either because of the risks involved or the returns in prospect, will not be worth while.

The origin of this expression is quite intriguing.

It goes back at least three hundred years to a time when candlelight was still the prevailing method of illumination.

Then, as now, of course, people enjoyed their various gambling pastimes.

However, candles cost money and many a game would be played in which the stakes were so slight as to make the winnings less than the price of the candles used.

So it was that the expression arose.

"The game is not worth the candle," which, of course, has broadened in application, though retaining in large part its original significance.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

MUGWORT

PEOPLE versed in the lore of "roots and yarbs" will tell you that a wreath of mugwort about the head of a child protects the child from malaria; and many say that a bunch of that herb hung up in the house is a general preventive against sickness. This belief in the magic virtues of mugwort prevails not only in the United States and Canada, but is common all over northern and central Europe, besides being known in China and Japan. But in continental Europe, whence we inherit the superstition, the mugwort, in order to be effective, must be gathered on midsummer eve—the eve of St. John's day. In fact, in France, for this reason, the herb is known as St. John's wort. In some places it is gathered on midsummer day instead of eve—but the idea holds that it must be gathered at midsummer. The midsummer part of the superstition, which is the key to it, appears to have been lost in crossing the Atlantic.

The mugwort superstition is a remnant of sun-worship. Mugwort was one of the plants supposed to become inoculated with the power of the sun-god when he reached his apogee of night and power in the heavens. In Europe bunches of mugwort gathered at midsummer are supposed to be a charm against witchcraft, and German peasants put bunches of the plant among the corn to keep off rats and mice. The old Germans, when they built their midsummer fires in honor of the sun, used to cast offerings of mugwort into them, thus casting away all ill luck.

It is a curious fact that in China bunches of mugwort gathered at the same time as in Europe—midsummer—are hung in the house for the same purpose they are in Germany—to keep the witches away. And in Japan, when a house has been robbed in the night, if they can discover the footprints of the thief they put mugwort on them to "cast a spell" on the culprit—to "make his feet sore," they say. Mugwort, then, is a plant beloved of the sun-god and its superstitious use is a survival of sun-worship.

CHECK!

A basket-ball Jinx as I understand is a "hoodoo" or a hobgoblin, or it might be termed a bad spirit, what ever the name "there ain't no such animal," that being the case it has no feelings, consequently it is a handy thing to lay blame upon as you cannot hurt its feelings. Leaving this aforesaid "Jinx" out of the argument will come one tell me how many basket ball teams in DeKalb County that were scheduled to play in the tournament Saturday, January 17, played a game the night of Friday, January 16?

High School Schedule

Date Event
Feb. 13 ..... Waterloo at St. Joe.

day, January 16? St. Joe did as you know, played a hard game and won, twelve hours later faced a team fresh from a long night's slumber and with a determination to "do or die," which, of course, is the right way for a basket ball team to feel. Then if a boy who smokes cigarettes is only 50% efficient, and three-fifths of a team smokes cigarettes, how high would be their ratio of efficiency?

A great many learned men concede that cigarettes do not hurt an adult, but all are agreed that they are harmful to a growing boy. So if we hire a special teacher to teach our boys and girls "basket ball instinct" starting in the grades, let us go a bit farther and have them taught the evil effects of cigarette smoking on health and strength and energy, and insist that no boy or girl who smokes cigarettes, in season or out of season be allowed to play basket ball. This may sound rather drastic, but I'll wager that if our boys were taught from the fifth grade up, that no cigarette smoker could play on the St. Joe basket ball team that 99% of our boys would refrain from smoking cigarettes.

No rule is effective, however, unless enforced. Another thing, the St. Joe basket ball team has lost a lot of games this season by a very small margin, but they have been good sports and played good clean basket ball, and I don't believe there has even been a time when a St. Joe fan has left a game with a feeling of shame for our team. We're proud of our team, we're proud of the good hard-played games they have lost. We want them to win, we want them to always be right but win or lose, right or wrong, here's to our team!

—Electric Fan.

SOMETHING TO THINK ABOUT

The Eighteenth Amendment at the time of its adoption was considered by many as the elimination of evils associated with intoxicating liquor. It has not proved so up to this time in this community. Controll of any commercial business by the government cannot be successful when the business lends itself to any individual who cares to participate in it by using its products, and when part of the people is against restrictive control, and the remaining part is indifferent to the actual and practical application of lawful regulation.

It is doubtful if the evils of the corner saloon were much worse than the present evils of the liquor traffic, especially, in places where local option was in force, for in such places the prohibition was created and imposed by the citizenry of the community who naturally were interested in seeing that their decision was enforced.

The corner saloon, at least, did not have salesmen hunting up boys to initiate into the degenerate habit, and have bootleggers making deliveries using the "underground telegraph" with a system of safety signals. Besides, formerly, the government derived a large amount of revenue from the harmful traffic, but, now, contrariwise, it must spend millions of dollars for inadequate enforcement, and suffer many indignities, such as an intoxicated official taking into custody others for smuggling the contraband into the country. And the despicable bootlegger takes into the underworld large profits for capital in building up his business and subsidizing other criminal sidelines.

If the citizens of the community would observe what happens in their midst all the important points above could be illustrated, and if they would really desire to do something about conditions mothers and fathers would not need to worry so much about their high school boys and girls coming home in an inebriate condition.

—The Booster.

LIVE STOCK NEWS

COMPARE PROTEIN FEEDS FOR SWINE

Alfalfa Hay Produced More Rapid Gains.

When corn, tankage, linseed oilmeal, and alfalfa hay were compared at the Michigan Agricultural college for winter pig feeding, it was found that:

1. Alfalfa hay produced somewhat more rapid gains and required considerably less feed for 100 pounds gain than did alfalfa meal or linseed oilmeal when each was fed with shelled corn, tankage and minerals.
2. Alfalfa meal made practically the same daily gains, but required somewhat more feed for 100 pounds gain than did linseed oilmeal, when each lot was fed shelled corn, tankage and minerals.
3. The addition of linseed oilmeal to a mixture of tankage and alfalfa meal or alfalfa hay produced somewhat less rapid gains and raised the feed requirements slightly when each mixture was fed with shelled corn, tankage and minerals.
4. The addition of alfalfa hay to tankage and linseed oilmeal when each combination was fed with shelled corn and minerals increased the gains somewhat and reduced the feed requirements for 100 pounds of gain.
5. Alfalfa hay with tankage and linseed oilmeal made approximately larger gains and required considerably less feed for the gains produced than did alfalfa meal with tankage and linseed oilmeal when each was fed with shelled corn and minerals.

Make Good Preparation for Arrival of Lambs

Lambs will be coming very soon and the farmer should make preparation well in advance for the little sheep babies. Clean out the sheds and bed them well with clean, dry straw. Cover the cracks in the walls so there will be no drafts, let the ewes go and come at will up to 140 days after you turned the ram with them. About the one hundred and forty-fifth day you should get your first lamb. Sheep vary in the gestation period about the least of any live stock. The little lambs will stand a surprising amount of cold if they come strong and the mother ewe is attentive and has a full udder. To a considerable extent the shepherd can control this feature by the care given the flock.

When a man tells me his ewes have no milk and the lambs are weak, I always think they were poorly fed, and while the amount may have been sufficient it could hardly be of the correct material, says a writer in an exchange. Ewes can be made fat on corn and corn fodder, and yet have weak lamb and no udder—when you starve the ewe you likewise starve the lamb. Once more good breeders are good feeders, but not always are good feeders good breeders. It sounds like the same but means quite different.

Fresh Air Is Cheapest Thing in Stock Ration

The cheapest thing in the ration for all live stock is fresh air. It contributes to the income from milk and meat as surely as does liberal feeding of a complete ration.

Buy this doesn't mean fresh air should come into the barn through cracks or open doors. It should come in by means of a well-designed ventilating system which at the same time removes the stale, moisture-laden air. A dairy cow breathes out ten pounds of water in 24 hours.

A good ventilating system requires good wall construction to hold heat in. There must be storage of all openings where passage of air is not wanted, and insulation to prevent escape of heat. Neglect insulation and your ventilation system will be faulty, your feed bills will be higher, your profits will be lower.

Live Stock Reminders

Feeding cubes to live stock is on the increase in this country. With the feed pressed into cubes there is less waste.

In cases where grain is scarce and it is necessary to utilize largely roughage, low-grade stocker and feeder steers or heifers are expected to prove quite profitable for next spring.

A layer of straw several inches thick placed over the single board roof of the hog house or poultry house to prevent frost forming inside the roof is a good practice. Frosty ceilings melt and make the house damp.

Brood sows need exercise. They also require some well-cured alfalfa or clover hay. A good mineral mixture will help keep the sows in condition. Let them have free access to both hay and minerals.

Oats is considered the best grain for colts, but corn or barley may be used in the ration if properly balanced with nitrogenous feeds, such as linseed oil meal or wheat bran. Alfalfa and clover hay are rich in lime, the principal mineral component of the bones.

Delay in Banking Check Costly to Cartoonist

In these days when every one is talking about the dearth of prosperity in this country, there is food for thought in the story of the cartoonist who received a three-figure check, but was so busy reading a book at the time that he forgot all about it and left it between the pages.

Some time later the artist married a widow with a son, and the boy, browsing through the books one day, found the check. Not only did he find it, but he deposited it. But in the meantime the firm that had made out the check had transferred its funds elsewhere and the check came back "No funds."

Of course the firm made the check good but informed the artist that inasmuch as he had so much money he would, in future, have the price of his work reduced 50 per cent.—Los Angeles Times.

Quick relief in digestive and eliminative troubles of men, women, children—and babies.

Why Some Shop Clerks Have Bad Dispositions

It happened in the hat shop in the East 50s. A young woman whose dress was distinguished by her flat heels and tailor-made jacket was having a hard time selecting a hat, and was still dissatisfied after the experienced clerk had brought out the entire stock. An acquaintance of mine, who was also trying on hats, heard her say:

"I want a hat that's mannish."
"Yes, miss; how about this one?" the attendant replied, bringing out the last of the assortment.
"Not mannish enough."
"But, miss," the other sighed wearily, "it's a man's hat."—New York Sun.

THE STORY

Returning to London, practically penniless, after an unsuccessful business trip, Sir George Sandison takes dinner with his widowed stepmother, his old nurse, "Aggy." He did not approve of her marriage to his father, but her explanation satisfies him. Little is left of the estate, and Lady Sandison proposes that they go to the United States to visit her brother, Robert MacBeth, wealthy contractor. Sir George agrees. MacBeth lives on an island estate with his daughter, Roberta, who longs for city life. MacBeth is a victim of arthritis and almost helpless. MacBeth is glad to see his sister and asks the two to stay. Roberta is keeping a date with Jack Navarro, about whom she knows little. MacBeth arranges for his sister to take charge of the household and George to act as secretary. Roberta does not approve of the arrangement.

CHAPTER IV

Her father had automatically cut off the greater part of Roberta's allowance, when her aunt became housekeeper. Roberta had had a stormy interview, in which her father had told her that as she was not willing for housekeeping, he had explained to keep house she would not be paid to her, in his business voice which was calm and devoid of any feeling whatever, that Lady Sandison had offered to do without payment, but that of course he would not permit.

"I recognize," he said, "that it is a job to run a big house. I recognized it when you tried it. That's why I increased your allowance, and that's why I reduce it now."

"Tried!" Roberta flashed out, passionately. "I did it."

"After a fashion," her father told her, "but you didn't put your mind on it. You disliked it and you didn't do it very well. Witness your pulling out yesterday, and leaving a crippled man alone without a servant to attend to him, or to the unexpected guests who arrived."

"Guests should not come uninvited and unexpected all the way from Bonnie Scotland," said Roberta flippantly. "Neither should relatives come without warning. Lady Sandison took that chance when she came here dragging Little Beauty with her."

"You don't like him, do you?" asked her father, ignoring the rest of her speech.

"Haven't bothered my head about him," Roberta told him angrily. "He's your guest, or employee, not mine."

"Just so. Well, he's not to be made to feel himself in the way."

Roberta opened her eyes. "I mean what I say," Rob MacBeth went on, still using his business manner and voice. "He's valuable to me. I like him, and as he's a young man he's to be paid some attention by the younger member of my family. I mean by that you are to see that he is properly introduced to any young people who come, if I'm not here. I'm not asking you to sacrifice yourself or do anything that might bore you."

"I won't," Roberta promised him with vehemence.

Her father held back the things he would have liked to say to her, and went one step farther along in his campaign to bring Roberta to her senses.

"Since you don't care for housekeeping, Roberta, and I must pay a housekeeper, have you thought of anything you would care to study?"

Roberta gave him a prolonged stare before she answered. "Study? Why, I've left school."

Her father nodded. "But you won't like hanging around idle, will you?"

Roberta opened her mouth and spoke, as is the habit of the younger generation, without thought and with heat, forgetting how wary are these middle-aged people—how quick to perceive and use any loophole given them.

"I don't know what I want. Except to get away from this place."

"Girls who don't know what they want are dangerous animals to let loose in strange surroundings. When you know what you want to do and we'll talk it over. Happiness, by the way, comes from within."

She hated him for his reasonable-ness.

Looking at her his face softened. "There was a time, Roberta, when you would have come to me and talked it over."

It was true. To her, as a child, her father had been some one great and powerful, whose coming meant gifts and fun, excursions, party clothes and treats innumerable. To be with her father, to walk beside him, silent or chattering as his mood permitted, to travel with him, to go to his office and see him monarch of all; to be made much of and to be admired by him and his friends, was as near heaven as this earth could give to Robert MacBeth's little daughter. It was different now. Now she wanted to arrange her own life, be happy in her own way, and here her father, once her greatest ally, to whom she ran for advice and suggestions, was decidedly in the way.

"Don't you feel like going over your plans with me?" Her father had been studying her downcast face.

She shook her head. She was oppressed with a desire to climb into his lap, to put her head against his shoulder as she used to do, but she would not yield to it. So across the gulf of the years that separated them, they looked at each other helplessly.

Helplessness being a state that Robert MacBeth was unaccustomed to and declined to accept, he said peremptorily: "Well, when you want me I'm here, my girl, and meantime what shall we do to make your aunt's visit pleasant?"

"I think you can manage that between you without my help," snapped Roberta.

"Just as you like. I thought it might amuse you to engineer it. Sir George will be a bit of a sensation here, don't you think?"

"I don't know. He doesn't interest me in the least."

Her father's face expressed a not too polite incredulity. "Since when?" he asked.

"Since I first saw him."

"Why?"

"Oh, I don't know. He's good-looking enough but he has no—"

He waited, but Roberta Did Nothing but Blow Smoke Rings.

her father's amused eyes upon her and blurted it out, "no sex appeal."

Her father smiled with laughter and, mortified, Roberta withdrew. She had seen Sir George coming from the library as she fled to the summer house, while her father still roared with delight over her last speech.

Would he tell Sir George? Roberta's face burned.

It was little less than marvelous how Lady Sandison took hold of the housekeeping. Roberta, anticipating the terrible awakening her aunt would have when she encountered the usual American housekeeping difficulties, had not been disappointed. Lady Sandison knew, none better, how housework should be done, and she saw that it was done in just that way.

She knew that in Roberta she had an enemy rather than an ally. Therefore she asked her brother, casually, how much his household bills amounted to on an average and being told, and showing the bills for the last few months, she had interviewed the new cook, stated the limit within which the bills were to be kept, promised her a bonus for any saving, and wiped that worry from her mind. She knew she had an ally in the new cook now, had made a possible saving for her brother's nurse, and later, when she knew more, she could be more drastic.

Lady Sandison, like most Scots of her class, was careful rather than mean, and provided well for both family and servants.

She was busy working out her plans, and adjusting herself to this vastly different life, with its vastly different needs, that she found herself plunged into. She was likewise very much concerned about her brother. It was her opinion that Rob was far too young a man to be crippled in this manner and she was planning an energetic campaign in which she meant to enlist the doctor, to get Rob to take a holiday far from domestic and office worries. But Rob would be hard to move and Roberta promised to be a barrier to any plan that took him from home just now.

Sunshine flooded the terrace, the island was steeped in beauty, yet

But Rob would be hard to move and Roberta promised to be a barrier to any plan that took him from home just now.

Sunshine flooded the terrace, the island was steeped in beauty, yet

Robert MacBeth shook his head as he spoke to his sister: "It was a mistake to tell Roberta your title."

"It would have been a bigger mistake to make a secret of it," said his sister, "and Roberta's not easily fooled. If you had tricked her she would have been just wild. She's red-headed."

"I don't recognize her at all," said Roberta's irritated father. "Six months ago when she left school, you wouldn't have wanted to know a sweeter or better mannered girl."

"Who?"

Robert glanced at his sister. "You're daft, Aggy! She's a mere child. She's popular enough with the boys, but there's no man. At least there's no one in particular, that I know of."

"It's the one you don't know that counts. She has something up her sleeve. What is it?"

Robert MacBeth shook his head. "She hates the island," he admitted reluctantly.

Aggy looked about her and sighed. "It's a bonnie place. But you never can tell about young people."

"Was there a pause?"

"Was there a pause?" Roberta ever asked you to let her do, Rob, and you refused?"

He shook his head. "Not any one particular thing. I think she had an idea she'd like to go abroad, but I thought that would come later. Anyway she hasn't made any clamor about it."

Aggy nodded her head. "Well, it will break out somewhere, and where you least expect it. I wish she'd fill the house with young folks. I'd like to see her amused."

"I'll give a party for you and Sir George. That'll stir up things maybe."

"Maybe," agreed Aggy and sighed. "I wish she liked me."

Rob sighed, too. "It's strange the two women I like best will neither of them like each other."

"I like her fine," declared Aggy. "It's me she cannot thole. She's under a good deal of strain, Rob. I wouldn't give this party unless she wants it. You're likely to have her make it a terrible failure if you give it before she's agreeable."

"I wish I knew what to do," said Roberta's father. "I know this is only a temporary phase of Roberta's character they're seeing now, but I don't like it. It gives an entirely wrong view of Roberta. When she is nice—is herself, I mean—no girl could be sweeter."

"I take your word for it," said Lady Sandison.

The doorway of the summer house darkened but Roberta did not look up. "I beg pardon," Sir George said softly. "Sorry to disturb you."

"I'm not disturbed," Roberta told him coldly. "What is it?"

She looked up at him and at once perceived her error in so doing. Ye gods! But he was handsome! Of course, he was. He showed his teeth and leaved his cold, she thought to herself.

He was looking at her questioningly. If Roberta could only have guessed it he too was disappointed in the island. It was beautiful, it was peaceful, but he might as well be in Sandisbree for all the excitement he was likely to find. Save for American slang and American manners and this girl's studied rudeness, life was as smooth as a mill pond.

"Smoke?" he asked and offered a cigarette.

"Father doesn't approve."

"Oh, well," Sir George said easily. "Fathers have to have some prejudices, but I must say your old id is remarkably free from them. Seldom met one more open-minded."

"Yes?"

"Jolly good sort, if you ask me."

"What? Oh, yes, quite so," Sir George smiled. "She was a pretty thing, this red-headed girl, even if she was a trifle brusque. Well, then, I volunteer the remark."

He waited, but Roberta did nothing but blow smoke rings. The middle-aged might be a puzzle to her but she flattered herself that she knew her own generation. This young man had come out to make himself agreeable. Well, he would be left to do it all by himself.

But she had mistaken her young man. He looked off over the river and then back at her. "Got something rather awkward to say to you," he advised. "Fact is there's a young man on the mainland trying to attract your attention for some twenty minutes."

"Where is he?" Roberta asked, her face stiff and masklike. To her utter chagrin she felt it stiffen. It must be Jack. Why did he make a fool of himself by coming here and not coming to the house only?

"Over beyond the bridge on the road. He's left his car—rather a spiffy car. He's down on the towpath now."

Doughboy Meant Well, but French Was Weak

After the American doughboy had been in France for a few months he picked up a few words of the language, and with admirable confidence began conversations with the French people that are remembered to this day as examples of how French ought not to be spoken.

After they had returned from the Lunville sector a soldier of the First division, billeted along the canal below Bar le Duc, saw the cow belonging to his landlady escape from a field and start up the road. He rushed into the house, and in his best French told her what had happened. She failed to understand and the soldier of a French soldier were called in, who informed her what had happened. She hurried out, rounded up the cow, and after returning to the house laughed for about five minutes at the puzzled doughboy. It developed that his message ran something like this: "Mademoiselle, mademoiselle, your milk is taking a walk!"

Lesson for February 8

JESUS THE WORLD'S TEACHER

LESSON TEXT—Luke 6:27-46.

GOLDEN TEXT—And as ye would that man should do to you, do ye also to them likewise.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus the Great Teacher.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus the Great Teacher.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Living by the Golden Rule.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Accepting the Standards of Jesus.

The context, verse 26, clearly implies what is elsewhere positively declared (John 15:18-21; Luke 21:17) that the followers of Christ will be hated and opposed. In this lesson Christ, the master teacher, sets forth principles governing the life of his followers.

I. "Love Your Enemies" (v. 27).

Love here is not a natural affection. To love enemies is easy, but to love enemies is only possible to those who have been made partakers of the divine nature—been born again.

II. "Do Good to Them Which Hate You" (v. 27).

Love is positive in its nature. The true disciple of Christ will not merely refrain from doing injury to the one who hates him but will be concerned with doing good to him.

III. "Bless Them That Curse You" (v. 28).

To bless means to speak well of, to invoke a blessing upon. Injury by words is hard to let go unchallenged. The true child of God will return blessings for cursings.

IV. "Pray for Them Which Despitefully Use You" (v. 28).

We should pray for those who abuse us. The best commentary on this precept is Christ's own example. "Father forgive them for they know not what they do" (Luke 23:34). When Christ was reviled, he reviled not again. When he suffered, he threatened not, but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously (I Peter 2:23).

V. Patiently Endure Wrong and Injury (v. 29).

The Christian is not to bristle in defense of his rights but is rather to suffer insult, injury, and even loss. This expresses the lack which should govern the individual's action, but should not be pressed so far that evil doers can go unchecked.

VI. "Give to Every Man That Asketh of Thee" (v. 30).

God himself is the supreme example of benevolence. He gives freely and generously but intelligently. This text does not authorize promiscuous giving. It does not mean that every request made by the idle, greedy, and selfish should be granted. A man in poverty needs to be given a way to earn his living.

VII. Do as You Wish to Be Done By (v. 31).

This is called "The Golden Rule." It is the sum total of Christian duty as it pertains to human inter-relationships. Human beings carry with them the consciousness of obligation which is the touchstone determining their duty to others. If this rule were lived up to, the problem of capital and labor would be solved, and war would be put to an end. International relations would be peacefully adjusted and all profiteering in business would end.

VIII. Be Ye Merciful (v. 36).

This means to be filled with pity and compassion, to enter into sympathy with every need of others. The heavenly Father is our supreme example.

IX. Censorious Judgments Condemned (v. 37).

This means that we should not seek out the evil or faults in others for our satisfaction. We should not sit in censorious judgment upon the action of others.

X. Compensation of Right Living (v. 38).

The one who gives freely of money, loves sincerely, makes the Golden Rule the standard of his life, shows mercy and kindness to others, and refrains from impugning the motives of others, will be fully rewarded in time.

XI. Danger of Following False Teachers (v. 50).

The one who does not know God and the way to heaven will lead others to ruin.

XII. Those Who Reprove Others Should Strive to Live Blameless Lives (vv. 41, 42).

We should remove evil doing from our own lives before bringing others to account.

XIII. The Sin of Profession Without Fruits (vv. 43-46).

The one who is in fellowship with God will practice the principles which reveal the nature of God.

Ought to Be Sunny and Cheerful

Of all the people we Christians ought to be the sunniest and cheeriest. What a difference it would make to the world if our religion made us all a singing folk, and if it helped us to comfort and establish other people.—J. D. Jones.

Forgiveness

Forgiveness is not only a deliverance from guilt—it is the removal of all that shuts out the love of God from the heart.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Testing Chestnuts for Resistance to Blight

Many persons can say that they have gathered chestnuts, but not many Americans can say they searched for them in the forests of Korea and Japan as can R. Kent Beattie, a forest pathologist of the Department of Agriculture who has just returned to this country from a two and a half years journey for that purpose.

Beattie was hunting for blight-resistant chestnuts to plant in American forests and during his sojourn in the Far East he collected about 250 bushels of nuts of native strains, and seeds of about 100 cultivated varieties.

He shipped these nuts to Washington and the Department of Agriculture planted them in its forest nursery at Glendide, Md., to test their resistance to blight and their adaptation to the climate and soil of a new homeland.

Hospital Experts See Possibility in Talkies

At the present time many plans that involve the taking of talking pictures are under consideration as a means of saving lives in the world. Three interesting possibilities are the entertainment of convalescent patients, the training of student nurses by the sight and sound method and the presentation of screen entertainment in connection with hospital fund-raising campaigns.

One hospital in Stockholm has used time for medical instruction for 15 years. But with the advent of the talking picture, the applications of the talking screen to medical and scientific advancement are increased a hundredfold. The hospital field has been awaiting the development of a portable motion picture sound projector, ready to plug into the electric light socket and to be wheeled from room to room as required.

Fable, New Style

A citizen approached an unemployed man vending apples on a windy corner and, according to him, he had without apparent intention of buying his wares, said:

"How is business?"

The unemployed apple vendor at once responded:

"At the moment, sir, it is slack, but it would improve by 100 per cent if you should buy now."

The moral of this is that sympathy vocalized by Small Moment unless it is supported by immediate wallet untrapping.—New York Sun.

THE ST. JOE WEEKLY N.W. ST. JOE, IND.

Thursday, February 6, 1931

THE FIRST REAPER

PERSONAL PARAGRAPHS

Gypsies made their appearance in town Monday morning.

Ye editor and wife were Sunday dinner guests of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Miller.

Miss Agneta Horn spent last Saturday and Sunday in the home of her parents at Kendallville.

Effective Monday, the Auburn factories changed their noon hours from 11:30 to 12:30, as has been the custom, to 12 to 1 o'clock.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Quance and children of Auburn and Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Hull were callers Sunday afternoon at the O. E. Ginter home.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Shroyer have been recent guests of the former's brother, Harley Struble, who is seriously ill at Sidney, Ohio.

Thomas Berry of Jackson township is minus his Ford Sedan. It was stolen at Auburn from its parking place on East Ninth St. Sheriff Hoff is investigating.

For sewing up stuffed roasts and poultry keep on hand a thick, strong, curved mattress needle with a large eye, and some clean white cord of a suitable size.

Mrs. E. A. Farnum of Butler was killed Saturday in an automobile accident, one Road 1, about 5 miles north of Fort Wayne and her sister, Mrs. Walter Mondhawk was injured. The car hit the bridge south of the Fitzgerald home and landed in the creek, right side up.

Mr. and Mrs. Roy Bowser entertained at Sunday dinner the following: Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Kinsey and family and Miss Inez Lorraine Martin of Fremont, Ind., Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Willett and family of Hicksville and Geo. Kinsey, wife and daughter, Inez of St. Joe.

County assessors would be given the duty of issuing automobile licenses, according to the terms of a new bill in the Indiana legislature. They would collect a fee of 25 cents for the service of which 18 cents would go to the county gravel road fund and 7 cents to the assessor.

A very pleasant time was enjoyed on Sunday at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Clay Coburn, when a number of friends and relatives came to remind Clay of his fifty-second birthday. An elaborate pot luck dinner was served at one o'clock to which all did ample justice and the afternoon was spent in a social way. The visitors left at a late hour thanking Mr. and Mrs. Coburn for an enjoyable day and wishing the host many happy returns of his birthday.

Mrs. Sherman Funk, residing about one mile east of Auburn, died Sunday night and E. R. Kinsey announces the funeral as being held from the home, Wednesday afternoon at 1 o'clock. For a number of years the Funk family lived west of town. Mrs. Funk was 53 years of age and death was the result of Bright's disease. She is survived by the husband and five children, Paul Funk and Mrs. Loretta Baughman, of Auburn, Marion and Marshall living at home and Mrs. Marie Hess of Avilla.

The action instituted last week for the recovery of damages in the auto accident in which James Scott died from injuries on May 3, was settled when W. H. Cullen & Son Co., paid to the administrator $262 damages. James Scott was operating an automobile on the highway running from Butler to St. Joe when the car collided with a truck owned by the defendants and driven by Dorley Beck. The plaintiff says the truck was on the wrong side of the road and was being driven at a high rate of speed. The deceased left four sons, Edward, Olin, Arnold and Carl Scott, all of whom are adults.

HORSE SENSE

To store a machine properly, clean and oil it, and get it prepared for another day's use. Tractors should be drained, new oil put in the crankcase, and the engine run long enough to let the oil circulate through the system.

There are two methods of establishing farm flocks of sheep. One is to begin with a few ewes and increase the size of the flock gradually by retaining the ewe lambs. The other method consists of beginning with as many ewes as the farm should maintain in its regular system of farming. For the beginner, the first method is the better.

Skim milk and butter milk have their highest feeding value when fed in limited quantities with grain. Three or four pounds of milk to one pound of grain for fattening hogs are desirable proportions.

Ripe fruits require little work on the part of the digestive organs. (Dr. John H. Kellogg.)

Apple trees growing in sod need annual applications of nitrogen.

One of the most hopeless wastes of time is that of planting a good shrub, tree, or flower in a careless manner, and neglecting it afterward.

Lilacs and red osier dogwoods must be watched closely for oyster shell scale.

If apples shrivel in common storage, soak the walls and floor frequently to maintain a higher relative humidity.

If you have a place on your farm that overflows occasionally and does not insure a good corn crop, try planting part of it in horseradish.

Versatile Musician
Victor Herbert played the violin in an orchestra. His musical education was received in Germany; he became principal violinist in the court orchestra at Stuttgart, then soloist on the concert platform. In 1888, when twenty-seven years old, he became solo cellist in the Metropolitan orchestra, New York city. In 1904 he organized his own orchestra.

Good Soil for Your Trees
While some trees will undoubtedly grow in a poor soil after they have become established, there is no advantage in starting trees in anything except the best garden soil. Usually that referred to as "topsoil" is the kind to have on hand in sufficient quantity for tree planting. Bear this in mind, says the American Tree association of Washington. Do not "spare the top soil and spoil the tree."

Plains of Abraham
The heights near Quebec known as the Plains of Abraham took their name from Abraham Martin, a Canadian pioneer who was a pilot on the St. Lawrence river. When Samuel de Champlain founded the city of Quebec he authorized a deed granting Martin a homestead on the heights, and his herds of cattle and sheep were a common sight on the tableland along the St. Lawrence river.

End of Louisiana Lottery
The Louisiana lottery received a charter from the state of Louisiana for 25 years in 1888. It had a monopoly on the business within the state, and was required to pay $40 annually into the state treasury. In 1930 the company made great efforts to secure a renewal of the charter, offering finally an annual payment of $1,250,000 for it, but the act rechartering the company was vetoed by the governor.

SURPRISED BY RELATIVES SUNDAY

Mrs. Reuben Koch, living north of Concord, was honored Sunday with a birthday surprise by her relatives. Mrs. Koch is 72 years of age, and when she returned from services at St. Joe, the following guests came in with baskets well filled:

Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Cosper, son, Dale and daughter, Thelma, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Cosper, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac McDaniel, and Fred Crooks all of Auburn, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Veazy of Ft. Wayne and Mr. and Mrs. Frank Johnson of St. Joe.

The day was most pleasantly spent in the Koch home and Mrs. Koch really felt younger. These are occasions which afford one who is advancing in years, many pleasant recollections.

NOTICE OF ADMINISTRATION

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That the undersigned has been appointed by the DeKalb Circuit Court, of the State of Indiana, Administrator with the will annexed of the Estate of Virginia Lawson deceased, late of said County.

Said Estate is supposed to be solvent.

CHARLES B. LAWSON,
Administrator.
With the Will Annexed.
January 30, 1931.
Russell R. Reidenour, Atty. 613.

T., Geo. A. Kinsey.
J. C. Hull was the installing officer.

EARLY CHICK TROUBLES

By Prof. H. D. Munroe
If the early baby chicks develop bowel trouble during the first three weeks, you may be sure that they have been chilled or overheated—about five changes of chilling to one of over-heating. If during the first three weeks, the chicks are weak but do not show much signs of bowel trouble, you can be quite sure that you waited too long before feeding them, or that they have not had enough to eat. Lack of enough feeding boxes and no feed in these boxes are the most common causes of this trouble.

After the third week, crowding is probably the most common trouble. This condition shows up in several sizes of chicks, and results in toe and tail picking and weak chicks. A crowded house never has enough hopper space. Over-heating shows up more the third week than ever before. As the chicks grow and get feathers, more ventilation and a lower temperature should be allowed.

Rickets or leg weakness will show up in a flock in three to five weeks if cod liver oil is not fed or if the birds are not allowed to get out into the sunlight. Most poultrymen neglect the feeding of green feed and this helps to develop unthrifty flocks.

The above mistakes develop a weakened condition in the flock which results in disease germs getting a hold on the birds. Coccidiosis is present in all flocks. It can be prevented from doing much damage by good management.

OBITUARY

Alice Wilderson Simanton, daughter of Levi and Sophia Wilderson, was born in Stark County, Ohio, August 21, 1865, and after a brief illness from cerebral hemorrhage departed this life in Auburn January 26, 1931, aged 65 years, 5 months and 5 days.

At an early age she with her parents moved to DeKalb county, Ind. In 1886 she was united in marriage to John Simanton. After their marriage they resided on a farm near St. Joe, Ind., until 14 years ago when they moved to Auburn.

Tena Levy was taken into their home when but a small child and reared to womanhood as their own child.

Mrs. Simanton is survived by her loving husband; foster daughter, Mrs. John Engle; one sister, Mrs. Emma Rugman; one brother, Frank Wilderson; a half sister, Menta Baker; a half brother, William Wilderson and a host of relatives and friends.

She was a kind loving wife always heading the needs and pleasures of others before herself.

WILL DISPOSES OF ESTATE OF ST. JOE LADY

Merritt Sechler qualified Tuesday afternoon, of last week, to act as the executor of the will of the late Amelia Benninghoff, by filing $129,000 bond. Notice of his appointment appears in this paper.

The estate consists of $60,000 in personal property and $4,000 in real estate. The death of Mrs. Benninghoff took place Jan. 22.

The will was executed Aug. 24, 1928, with Bert A. Clemmer and Mabel Fogwell as witnesses. It made the following bequests: to Mabel Thornton, $500; to Anna Hursay, $100; to John Koch $100; to Howard Benninghoff, $1,000; to Grace Dilley, a set of Haviland dishes; to Jessie Moffet, a diamond ring; to Daniel Benninghoff, Sr., all the personal effects in the household that originated in the Benninghoff family; to the respective persons whose names are written on them, certain articles in the household; to Merritt Sechler, the east 60 acres of the old Sechler farm in Concord township, including the buildings; 60 acres of the same farm, which Merritt Sechler has the right to buy with in five years, at $40 an acre, but which otherwise goes in equal shares to Harlow, Ralph and Roscoe Sechler, who come into possession of the property at once.

The will also provides that the Lincoln bank receive $6,000 as a trust fund, the income of which is to be distributed annually in equal shares to the Newville Christian Church, the Newville U. B. Church, the St. Joe Christian Church, the St. Joe Evangelical Lutheran Church, the St. Joe Methodist Church and the Jacobs Union Church at Jacksonville, Pa., which is located near Wanamaker, Pa., the original home community of Mrs. Benninghoff's parents.

If any of these churches should disband, the income allotted to it shall go to the remaining churches and when the last church has been disbanded the $6,000 is to be distributed to the poor of Allen and DeKalb counties in the discretion of the trustees, with restriction as to religious denominations.

Provision for a Brother

The Lincoln bank also is made trustee of a fund of $10,000 for the benefit of a brother of Mrs. Benninghoff, Joseph Sechler of St. Joe. She stated that she realized at the time the will was made that her brother had sufficient means, but she added that "the pitfalls of life are many and I am making this provision especially as a security for him in his declining years."

Upon the death of the brother, the will provides for the distribution of the $10,000 and accrued income among Mrs. Benninghoff's cousins in full blood living at that time east of longitude 81 degrees west, which is near the west boundary of the state of Pennsylvania, but not to their heirs; and also among the following cousins: Henry Sechler, Frank Sechler, Rose Widney, Jessie Sommers, Frank Balz, Frances Cooper, Wm. Sechler, Nora (Blue), Harlow Sechler, Roscoe Sechler, Arlie Sechler, Leon Sechler, John Sechler, Grace Dilley, Avis Staman, Agnes Monroe, Ralph Sechler, Edith Cole; Merritt Sechler, Cora Curie and Flossie Mavis. The residue of the estate is also devised to these same heirs.

The attention of the executor is called in the will to a trust fund of $1,000 established with the Tri-State Loan & Trust Co. of Fort Wayne, in 1928, the income to be paid to the Evergreen cemetery of Newville.

The testator's watch and chain were bequeathed to Louise Sechler, daughter of Ralph Sechler. A codicil was executed by Mrs. Benninghoff May 20, 1930, with Oras L. Burgener and Mabel Fogwell as witnesses, by which she left $1,500 to Daniel A. Benninghoff Sr. and a like amount to Margaret Benninghoff.

A second codicil was executed July 10, 1930, with Clarence Mounts and Curtis Hursay as witnesses, by which the name of Jessie Moffet mentioned in the will was corrected to make it Jessie Sommers.

By a third codicil executed Nov. 18, 1930, with Capt. W. D.

Stump, Inez N. Chapman and Marie Akin as witnesses. Mrs. Benninghoff bequeathed her home property to Merritt Sechler.

PHILIP CARPER CHOSEN SECRETARY 29th TIME

The Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance company of DeKalb county held its annual meeting in Auburn in the court house assembly room Saturday afternoon.

The members of this company met to hear the reports of officers of the business and condition of the company for the past year and elect new officers and three members on the board of directors.

Noah A. Long was re-elected president. Frank E. Lyon of Wilmington township, DeKalb county auditor, was elected to succeed J. H. St. Clair of Auburn as vice president. Philip Carper, of Jackson township was re-elected secretary for the twenty-ninth consecutive year. Two other candidates were placed in nomination in opposition to Mr. Carper, Marion Clark of Smithfield and Albert Yoder of Jackson township.

Perry Fols of Richland township, was named treasurer. C. H. Bangs of Stafford township, actuary and Albert Thrush of Butler township, William Potter of Franklin township and Claud Fitch of Butler township were elected to the board of directors.

The board, consisting of five members is now made up of Mr. Thrush, Mr. Potter, Mr. Fitch, Albert Yoder of Jackson township and C. S. Arford of Stafford township.

Report of Secretary

Philip S. Carper, secretary, made the following report of the year's business:
During the year ending Oct. 31, 1930, the company sustained 74 losses. The total amount of losses was $27,460.47. Of this sum $18,389.63 was in the rodded class and $9,070.84 in the unrodded class. Amount of insurance in the rodded class $10,282,770. Amount of insurance in the unrodded class $2,055,280.

An assessment of 25 cents per $100 was made in the rodded class and 50 cents in the unrodded to pay the losses, the cost of inspecting all risks, rewriting all of our insurance and the regular yearly expenses.

New insurance to the amount of $906,970 was written during the year. Total amount of insurance now in force is $12,437,700, a net gain of $772,250.

The amount of insurance in force in the township is as follows:

Total, $12,437,700.
Losses paid, $27,531.27.
Cash in treasury, December 31, 1930, $397,36.

DISTRIBUTE SEED CORN IN MARCH

The week of March 9 is being set aside as "assembly week" by the Indiana Farm Bureau for the collection and distribution of seed corn. Members in upstate counties who were more fortunate during the crop growing season last year, have pledged nearly 4,000 bushels of seed to be donated to members downstate where the drought affected the crop.

A central point will be selected in each of the counties where seed has been pledged where it will be assembled during the week designated. County farm bureau units in the southern part of the state where the seed will be received will provide trucks which will transport it from the northern counties. Farm bureau members in southern counties where the need is urgent will be the beneficiaries.

Deposits of seed corn will label their sacks with a tag giving their names and addresses and those who receive the corn will add their names and addresses and return them to the donors. In this manner the upstate farmers will know the destination of their seed and the beneficiaries.

PUTS WILL ROGERS ON "NUT BRIGADE" STAFF

"The sage of Tishomingo" met the "sage of Claremore" in Oklahoma's statehouse and lost a 15-minute battle of wit.

When Will Rogers, the cowboy humorist of Claremore, walked from the office of Gov. William H. Murray, he had obtained one of the governor's prized appointments—a colonelcy on the honorary military staff.

Murray assigned Rogers to the "nut brigade."

"Hello, governor," greeted Will as he walked into the governor's office, grinning broadly.

"I've got a list of campaign expenditures and I want to talk to you about an appointment."

Most of the conversation concerned the comedian's father, Clem Rogers, a member of the Oklahoma constitutional convention with Murray.

"I talked with Uncle Clem years ago," said Murray.

"All his family have been statesmen. He told me he had one son he was afraid was going to the bad. All this darn fool son would do was stand around and crack jokes. What I'm wondering is if this Uncle Clem Rogers was any kin of yours," Alfalfa Bill asked.

"Yep, that was papa and I'm his son," Will replied.

Rogers is barnstorming through Oklahoma, Texas and Arkansas, raising drought relief funds for the Red Cross.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CON- TENTION WELL ATTENDED

Judging by the attendance and interest shown, the Sixty-Fifth Annual Convention of the DeKalb County Council of Religious Education was, one of the most successful in the history of the association.

Ideal weather prevailed throughout the two day session, which added greatly to the enjoyment and pleasure of those attending and brought folks from a distance who otherwise would have been unable to attend.

The Lutheran Church was convention headquarters, where registration began at 9:00 A. M. Thursday morning with Mrs. Lena Meek in charge, assisted by Mrs. Gladys Hull and Kathaleen Gee. Mr. and Mrs. Harry Richer of Peru were in charge of the music, and opened the convention with worship and song service; Rev. B. W. Mayfield of the St. Joe M. P. Church read the morning scripture lesson and offered prayer; Ward Jackson then made a few remarks and informed the convention of the illness of Rev. Ezra Flora, and his inability to be present. A committee, consisting of Fred Leighty, Harry Rowe and Henry Fretz, was appointed by Mr. Jackson to draft resolutions of sympathy, to send with the greetings of the convention to Rev. Flora.

Mr. Jackson then introduced the first speaker, Harry G. Rowe, State Supt. of Young Peoples Division, who talked on the subject, "The Leader and the Program." Among the many good things said in his address were that, "A leader must know the nature of his work, must know the scope, must be what he wants other folks to become, he must study his task and build his program around the needs. Some churches grow stale because they fail to meet the needs of the people."

Prof. R. C. Wingard of Manchester College was then introduced by Mr. Jackson and he very ably took Dr. Flora's place on the program throughout the convention. His first address being on "The Teaching Ministry of the Church." He cited Jesus as the perfect teacher because he taught with a purpose, he had a message worth hearing. His statements were clear, he was a past master in the art of questioning, he needed no special method because a living faith has no need of a special method. As a teacher Jesus always gave the child first place.

The afternoon program opened with song services conducted by Mr. Richer. Scripture reading and prayer by Rev. George Stoll of the St. Joe and Spencerville Lutheran Churches. Mr. Rowe gave his place on the afternoon program to Miss Lenadell Wiggins of Funkhannock, Pa., field secretary of the National W. C. T. U., who gave a splendid talk on "Law Enforcement and Prohibition."

Divisional conferences were then held with Harry E. Richer handling the subject, "What to Sing, Where and Why;" "The Supremacy of Childhood" by R. C. Wingard and "Our Young People" led by Harry G. Rowe. Mrs. Nora McDonald, Educational Supt. presided at the afternoon session.

The banquet was held in the hot lunch room at the school house, Harry G. Hursh being toast master. Mr. Richer led a few "pép" songs while the first course was being served. After the second course was served Mr. Hursh took the floor and introduced several speakers who gave short talks. Among those speaking were, Miss Violet Pfauwer, Miss Margaret Hamilton, Miss Violet May, Miss Ruth Hawk, Miss Edith Reeder, Lehr Wilder and Ralph Manrow. All handled their subjects well and Mr. Hursh proved himself to be an able toast master.

The banquet was served by the Ladies Aid of the Church of Christ and the careful service and appetizing food added much to the enjoyment of the banquet.

The main meeting of the evening session was held in the St. Joe Gymnasium with Ward Jackson presiding. Worship and praise service was led by Mr. Richer.

Prof. Wingard's address for the evening was "Mining in Minds." Harry G. Rowe talked on "Sunday School Sleepers and Good Alarm Clocks." Both speakers brought wonderfully uplifting and spiritual messages. Mr. Rowe's probably being the outstanding address of the convention.

Several special musical numbers were given at this session, Mr. Richer singing, Mrs. Richer playing the violin with Mrs. Lora Leighty accompanying.

The Bible Story and Bible Memory contest was held in the Lutheran Church with Mrs. Gertrude Borthwick, Childrens Division Supt., and Miss Rose Smith, Young Peoples Division Supt., in charge. There were four contestants in the Bible Memory contest and five in the Bible Story. The young people and children gave their work well, before an interested and appreciative crowd, the high honors going to Lenore Laub and Loretta Laub, daughter and son of Mr. and Mrs. Claud Laub of the Coburntown Church in Spencer township, who will now compete for state honors in a regional contest.

Friday morning the convention opened with Harry Hursh presiding. Mr. Richer led the worship and praise service. Rev. Holloper read scripture and offered prayer. The reports of the county officers were given, the report of the township standings, and the report of the nominating committee. The following officers were elected to serve for the coming year.

President, Ward Jackson.
1st Vice Pres., Stanley Means.
2nd Vice Pres., Fred B. Leighty.
3rd Vice Pres., Henry Fretz.
Sec.-Treas., Sadie Coy.
Childrens Supt., Gertrude Borthwick.
Young Peoples Supt., Rose Smith.
Assistant, Helen Manrow.
Adult Supt., Clyde Hart.
Educational Supt., Nora McDonald.
Administrative Supt., Harry G. Hursh.

"The New Visions of the Church" was the subject of the morning address given by Rev. E. W. Wickersham. Rev. Wickersham pointed out that the church's duty doesn't end with our own community. The only way the church can save its life is to lose it, let us not spend too much time on trivial things; let us consider folks, not things, not what? but who?

Clyde Hart presided at the last session Friday afternoon, which was held at the "Gym." The boys and girls of Junior High School attended this session in a body. Mr. Richer led the song service, the singing being done largely by the boys and girls. Mr. Rowe then gave a talk to them which was both profitable and entertaining. The convention folks enjoyed having the high school group with them very much.

Prof. R. W. Wingard brought the closing message of the convention on "The Teaching Ministry of the Church." The convention closing with prayer.

It would be impossible in a short sketch to mention the many beautiful musical numbers given, solos, by Mr. Richer, violin and piano duets by Mrs. Richer and Mrs. Leighty which added much to the fine spiritual atmosphere of the convention. It was truly a two day feast of music and fine addresses which the hearers can treasure up in their hearts, and which will help them in their work the coming year.

Mention should also be made of the fine dinners served by the Lutheran ladies at the noon hour, as a good dinner is much appreciated by folks driving a distance as well as by the home folks.

Altogether the convention has been pronounced a success, St. Joe handling it as nicely as has any convention town. The count and registration shows that nearly eight hundred people attended the convention during the two days, and the hope is that the good derived from it may be far-reaching and lasting.

PARENT-TEACHER PRO- GRAM ANNOUNCED

In addition to the rhythm band presented by Miss Martha Miser's class of the local school as the outstanding entertainment feature, at the P. T. A. meeting, Thursday, February 12, several numbers pertaining to Lincoln and Washington will be given by the pupils in Miss Morr's room. A reading entitled "Why We Celebrate Washington's Birthday" will be given by Freda Franks, Helen Justison, Jean Ridgway and Doris Webb. Louise Schler will be pianist. Jean Ridgway is giving a reading on "When I Think of Lincoln."

Young Master Richard Ridlan will be the leader of the rhythm band. There will be twenty children from the first and second grades taking part in it.

The debate which is a part of the program contributed by the Public Speaking class of the Senior H. S. is on the topic, "Resolved, that Capital Punishment be Abolished in the U. S." On the affirmative team from St. Joe are Margaret Hamilton, DuWayne Kinsey and Basil Sheffer, speakers and Carleton Shull, alternate. The class feels fortunate in being able to secure County Superintendent of Schools, Mr. Stallman, as chairman of the debate. The judges, although the names have not been definitely announced, will be three persons from Auburn, prominent in their respective occupations.

This program should be more than just entertaining, it should be instructive as well. Furthermore, it represents another activity of the school, and as such deserves the community's wholehearted and friendly support. Come Thursday night at 7:30.

ORDERS GUARDIAN FOR ISAAC MESE OF ST. JOE

Over the protest of Frank Meese, son of Isaac Meese of St. Joe, Judge Endicott established a guardianship Tuesday for the aged man.

The petition was filed by Mrs. Rosetta Meese. For the last several months Isaac Meese has been failing and Dr. Benjamin O. Shook of Spencerville, testified that he is no longer able to take care of himself, Frank and his wife have been looking after him and the aged man's wife, who is Frank's stepmother, lives with a daughter, Mrs. Ivan Hutton, and husband east of Auburn.

Isaac Meese is a veteran of the Civil War and his pension is $100 a month. His wife has received none of this money and she wanted a guardian appointed so that she could get a portion for her own support. Frank Meese, by his attorneys, Russell R. Ridenour and Capt. H. C. Springer, contended there was no use to appoint a guardian because the pension is not sufficient to buy necessities for the old man and there is nothing left for his wife. Dr. Shook testified that his charge for medical services now runs about $60 a month and that a fair charge for a man's work in taking care of Mr.

Meese is $2.50 a day, or about $75 a month.

Atkinson & Husselman, counsel for Mrs. Rosetta Meese, told the court they believed the care could be procured for less than $75 a month and called Mrs. Leona Gablick of St. Joe to the witness stand. Mrs. Gablick said that she and her husband would make a home for Mr. Meese and care for him for $50 a month.

Dr. Shook gave it as his opinion that Mr. Meese will live only a month or six weeks longer. However, the court decided to grant the petition for a guardianship and appointed Frank R. Bowman of St. Joe, for the trust. Mr. Bowman will, if possible, pay some of the pension money to Mr. Meese's wife.

Mr. Bowman qualified at once. Dr. Shook and Isaac A. McDannell being his sureties.

FORMER ST. JOE AGED MAN HURT IN FALL

Mr. Florance Buchanan, aged 89, of 3530 Piqua Avenue, Fort Wayne, suffered an injury to his hip when he fell to the sidewalk in the 3700 block of Piqua Avenue Saturday afternoon.

The aged man was on his way to a barber shop when he fell. It is believed he suffered a fractured hip. He was removed to his home in the city ambulance.—News Sentinel, Monday evening.

No word has been received here as to his condition, but it is hoped not as serious as reported. Mr. and Mrs. Buchanan are making their home in Fort Wayne with Mr. and Mrs. Frank Rhoades.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Herber and son, of Fort Wayne, were Sunday dinner guests in the Chas. Curie home.

FALLS ON ICE SATURDAY AND BREAKS LEG

Mrs. Ida Herrick is at Fort Wayne, in the home of her son, Ray Herrick, and wife, as the result of falling on the ice Saturday afternoon at her country home, and breaking her right leg, just above the ankle.

She was carrying rain water and when she took the pail out to set it down, slipped and received injury above described.

She was taken to Fort Wayne Monday afternoon in the Kinsey ambulance, where she will be cared for a couple of weeks.

JUNIOR HIGH TOURNAMENT IN AUBURN ON FEB. 19-21

Preparations are under way for the Junior High School basketball tournament to be played in Auburn Alumni Gymnasium on Feb. 19 and 21. The tournament will open on Thursday night, Feb. 19 at 7 o'clock with a game between the North Keyser and Altona fives. At 8 o'clock Spencerville and Mooresville will contest for honors. The next game in the tournament will not be played until Saturday morning, Feb. 21, when Auburn will meet St. Joe at 8 o'clock. At 9 o'clock Garrett and Ashley will play and at 10 A. M. Waterloo and Butler. The winners in the above games will play at 11 A. M., 2 P. M., and 3 P. M., and the finals will be played at 8:30 P. M. As a preliminary to the finals, teams representing the Auburn faculty and Garrett faculty will play.

Two second cars have been sold by Hanna Motor Sales during the past few days. Mrs. Eva Wasson purchased a Buick Sedan and John Coburn a Chevrolet Coupe.

Lesson for February 15

JESUS THE FRIEND OF SINNERS

LESSON TEXT—Luke 7:36-50.

GOLDEN TEXT—This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief. PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus and Those Who Do Wrong. JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus and Wrong-doers. INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Jesus the Friend of Sinners. YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Jesus Transforming Sinners.

I. A Penitent Woman's Act of Love (vv. 37, 38).

1. The place (v. 37). It was in the house of Simon, the Pharisee, while Jesus was sitting at meat. When she knew of Christ's visit in this home, she came to lavish upon him her affections.

2. The act (v. 38). She washed Jesus' feet with her tears and wiped them with her hair. Through some means she had heard of the pardoning grace of Jesus Christ and God had opened her heart to receive Jesus as her personal Savior.

3. Who she was (v. 37). Her name is not given. There is no good ground for assuming that she was Mary Magdalene. The implication is that she was of a notoriously bad character. Though known to the public as a bad woman, something had happened which transformed her. She was a saved sinner because she believed on Jesus Christ.

II. The Pharisee's Displeasure (v. 40).

Simon felt scandalized by such a happening at his table. He was a respectable man. For Jesus to tolerate such familiarity on the part of a woman of such evil repute greatly perplexed him. Though he believed in Jesus enough to invite him to dine with him, he questioned within himself as to whether, after all, he was not mistaken. He reasoned if Jesus were a real prophet, he would have known the character of this woman and would have either withdrawn his feet from her or thrust her back with them; or if he knew her character, his tolerance of such familiarity proved that he was not a good man.

III. Jesus Teaches the Pharisee (vv. 40-50).

He taught him by means of the parable of a creditor and two debtors. It is to be noted that Jesus made it very clear that he not only knew the woman but knew Simon also.

1. The common debt (v. 41). The woman was a sinner—so was Simon, though he was not the same kind of a sinner that she was. There were two debtors, though the one owed ten times as much as the other. This is still representative of all sinners. The Bible declares all to be sinners, yet recognizes degrees of guilt. Full credit ought to be given to the man who is honest, virtuous, generous, and kind, yet such a life will not secure entrance into heaven. Much harm has been done by even evangelical preachers through failure to recognize the essential differences in human character. On the other hand, the Savior's words are a severe rebuke to the respectable Pharisees who are sitting in judgment against sinners of a coarser type.

2. The common insolvency (v. 42). "And when they had nothing to pay," Jesus freely granted the difference in the degree of the woman's sin and those of the Pharisee, but drove home to him the fact that they were both debtors and had nothing with which to pay (Rom. 8:23). As sinners we may quit our sinning and hate our deeds but that does not make satisfaction for the sins of the past. What we have done is irrevocable—it has passed from our reach. Every transgression shall receive a just recompense of reward (Heb. 2:2). We must come to our Redeemer, the Almighty God, and acknowledge our insolvency and accept the kindness of Jesus Christ who bore our sins in his own body on the tree (1 Pet. 2:24).

3. The relation of forgiveness and love (vv. 44-50). Simon's reluctant answer to Jesus' question showed that he got the point of Jesus' teaching. In order to make his teaching concrete, Jesus turned to the woman, calling Simon's attention to what she had done in contrast to what he had done. Simon had neglected to extend to Jesus the common courtesies of a respectable guest, but this woman had lavished upon him her affections and gifts. The measure of one's love is determined by the measure of the apprehension of sin forgiven. The one most forgiven will love most frequently the worst sinners make the best saints.

Become Like Him

The all-important thing is not to live apart from God, but as far as possible to be consciously with him. It must needs be that those who look much into his face will become like him.—Charles H. Brent.

Pity

Pity is love stooping, love drawn down by helplessness and want. Pity is love touched with sympathy, love sorrowing and suffering in our sorrow.—C. H. Spurgeon.

No Sentiment Against Hum of Motor Airplane

"Sure, they pass over my house, but I like 'em," a Portland (Maine) resident told the aviation committee of the realty board, which was considering the problem of low-flying airplanes. If we are not mistaken, he voiced the popular sentiment. The airplane is not yet so commonplace as to be regarded as a nuisance when its noise distracts the attention and perhaps disturbs the morning slumbers of city residents. Instead, the hum of its motor appeals to the imagination, and the thoughts of stay-at-homes travel with it on the freedom of its flight.

We have no such attitude toward the sputtering motorcycle or the automobile running with open cut-out. They simply add to the city noises and we would prefer that they were silenced. But the man-made bird flies overhead and we are all attention. "There goes the air mail," we say, and so accurately are its crossings timed that we could almost see our timepieces by it. Or a chance plane speeds by and we pause in our accustomed tasks and the eye follows its graceful progress through the heavens. Time will come when airplanes will be as numerous above us as automobiles are about us, and then we may tire of their staccato throbbing and long for mechanical silencers or wish that they would keep to cloud levels where their distant droning would hardly reach us. But just now we must admit that we, too, like 'em.

The risks of low flying are another consideration altogether.—Exchange.

Warning

Inez Haynes Irwin, noted novelist, said in an address on eugenics in New York:

"For her children's sake a girl shouldn't marry an old man. She shouldn't do it for her own sake, either, unless she wants to be unhappy."

"A girl married an old man, and one day a year or so afterward she said to him querulously:

"James, you promised me, if I married you, that my every wish would be gratified."

"Well, ain't it?" growled James.

"No," said she, "for I wish I hadn't married you."—Detroit Free Press.

Metal Turnings

The value of the refuse of the machine shop, cast iron borings or steel chips, has been about trebled by the development of a briquetting machine. Chips and turnings of this sort, when held together loosely, cannot be profitably remelted. But in the form of well-compacted briquettes, such as the machine is capable of producing, the scrap constitutes material that can be melted with as little loss as is pig iron. In actual practice, scrap which was formerly worth $7 a ton is now worth $20.

New York's Great Museum

The Museum of the City of New York was erected at a cost of $1,500,000 on Fifth avenue. The building, designed by Joseph Freedlander, is in Georgian Colonial style and the same style prevails throughout the interior. In the entrance hall is a circular staircase of solid marble constructed without steel support. The museum is filled with exhibits depicting the city's history. Among them are a gallery devoted to the history of retail selling, history of transportation, a history of the New York stage, models depicting the history of New York architecture and exhibits illustrating the growth of the telegraph, telephone, cable and postal departments. The Museum of the City of New York was incorporated July 21, 1923, to visualize by exhibits the development of New York city life from the earliest times.

"Apple of Discord"

According to Greek mythology, the Apple of Discord was the golden fruit thrown among the Olympian divinities by the Goddess of Discord (Eris), bearing the inscription, "For the Fairest." Aphrodite (Venus), Hera (Juno), and Pallas (Minerva) became competitors for it, and its award to the first by Paris so inflamed the jealousy and hatred of Hera to all of the Trojan race (to which Paris belonged) that she did not cease her machinations till Troy was destroyed. This story is introduced in Tennyson's "Gone with the Wind."

Flinging

Maxine Attelberry of Inglewood relates the experience of little five-year-old Virginia, who came from the northern states to make her first visit to southern California. It was here that she saw her first team of mules and they created a profound impression. She watched them for some time in fascinated interest and then exclaimed:

"Oh, mother, come see these funny horses wink their ears!"—Los Angeles Times.

Many Britons Own Planes

There are 235 privately owned airplanes in Great Britain, according to a report to the Department of Commerce. One person owns four planes while more than 20 own two each. Twenty-five of the planes belong to women.

Some of the worst scolding is carried on by persons who never do anything themselves.

GOOD THING THIS IS WASHDAY, MARY. I PUT ON MY LAST CLEAN SHIRT THIS MORNING

THAT REMINDS ME—I'M TRYING A NEW LAUNDRY SOAP TODAY. THEY SAY IT SAVES SCRUBBING

THAT NOON

HELLO, MARY! IRONING ALREADY? AREN'T YOU TIRED?

NOT AT ALL! THAT NEW HARD-WATER SOAP—RINSO—SAVES ALL HARD WORK, AND GETS THE CLOTHES MUCH WHITER, TOO

Don't scrub—it's foolish! Soak clothes whiter

SCRUBBING doesn't get clothes as white as Rinso does. It only gives you weary muscles—and scrubbed-out looking clothes. Rinso washes clothes clean—snowy white—without scrubbing or boiling—even in the hardest water. Safely.

Great in washers, too. The makers of 40 famous washers recommend Rinso. Wonderfully economical. Cup for cup, it gives twice as much suds as light, puffed-up soaps. And it's all you need—no bar soaps, chips or softeners.

Get the BIG package of Rinso today. Try it for dimes, too—it's marvelous.

The SANDMAN STORY

NEW STYLE PAJAMAS

MAHALIA'S little cousin Florence had come to visit her. The days were so filled with things to do that they never had enough time to do all they planned. "It's such a nuisance," Mahalia said, "to get undressed every night and get dressed again every morning. It takes up so much time just doing the same thing over and over again."

"Of course there are our baths. But it seems as though every other night we might just go to bed with our clothes on and so save all that time."

"Let's do it tonight so we'll be all ready for tomorrow," Florence suggested.

"Yes, we've got so much to do tomorrow," Mahalia said. "And it will give us a splendid start of half an hour anyway if we don't have to get dressed."

But after they were in Mahalia's room it seemed funny not to begin taking off their clothes.

"I suppose we'd better comb our hair and do our faces and teeth," Mahalia suggested.

"Yes, I suppose we'd better do that much. I tell you, let's wash our faces awfully hard so they'll stay clean over night."

"That's a good idea," Mahalia agreed. So they combed their hair and brushed their teeth and washed their faces, until their faces actually hurt from scrubbing. Then they both stretched themselves on the bed.

"I don't think it's very nice not to take our shoes off—on account of the bed," Mahalia said.

"That's true. Your mother mightn't like it. I tell you, I'd mind keeping my shoes on, but your mother mightn't like it."

"Yes, I was just thinking of my mother," Mahalia said, a little weakly.

Once more they stretched themselves upon the bed. Their feet felt a little cool and they pulled the quilt over them.

But now they felt too warm. "It will be wonderful to get right out to play tomorrow, won't it?" Mahalia said as though she had a little doubt about it now.

"Yes, fine," Florence answered, in just about the same tone. "I think, maybe," she added, "I'd better take off my dress. I only have one with me, you know, now that my white one is all dirty. Your mother might wonder why it looked so mused."

So she took off her dress. "Maybe I'd better do the same," Mahalia said.

Then they decided to stay as they were. It would only take a minute or two to slip on their dresses and shoes. Otherwise they were all ready.

It was very hard to get to sleep. They tossed about and didn't know whether their arms felt shivery or whether they felt too warm with their clothes on and the quilt over them as well.

But they stayed as they were with the clock striking the hours and the half-hours. It took the clock so long to get around to the half-hours and the hours during the night.

"I don't seem to feel very sleepy," Florence said after a long time during which they'd tried to keep very quiet so as not to disturb the other who might be sleeping.

"Neither do I," Mahalia said. Florence had known she was still awake, as Mahalia had gently cleared her throat to let Florence know it in case she, too, was awake.

"In fact, I feel so wide-awake. I think maybe it's my stockings. But I don't want to take them off as they take some time to get on in the morning. Several minutes, anyway."

"Maybe we'll stay awake right through the night," Florence suggested. "How early do you think we could get up?"

"Well, not before quarter of six anyway, I don't suppose. And it's only twelve now."

They heard the clock strike half-past twelve, one, half-past one, two. Then they fell asleep.

The sun was very bright when Mahalia's mother came into the room. "I thought you two were going to get up early this morning. Do you know it's eleven o'clock?"

They pulled the quilt around them so as not to know they had never undressed.

"I suppose that's the reason why people do get undressed every single night," Mahalia said, "so they can sleep easily. It's stupid but it's the only way."

THE LINCOLN CABIN

Behold! The timbers rough, the lintel low,
The homely fireplace where he sought the light
And warmth that only such a place could know,
The door that opened to a world of might.
Stand here and feel the longing that could change
This home for that one highest in the land,
Look at this hearth, of circumstances strange,
Think of his soul-fire, by ambition fanned.

Remember how his great heart throbbed and beat,
Remember how his great brain understood,
The long, hard road that stretched before his feet,
The evolution of his brotherhood,
And how your head, let quick tears flow today.

He, from this dark beginning, found the way.
—Kurtis Kurtz Gussling, in the Philadelphia Ledger.

Lincoln Marriage Home

to Be National Shrine

The rude log cabin at Harrodsburg, Ky., in which the parents of Abraham Lincoln were married, is to be made a national shrine dedicated to prayer and marriage.

The building, copy of a Kentucky Baptist church of 1800, will be dedicated June 12, 1931, the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the marriage of Thomas Lincoln and Nancy Hanks.

Citizens of Harrodsburg, the only Colonial town west of the Alleghenies, and the place where George Rogers Clark conceived his conquest of the Northwest, say the shrine will remove the last vestige of the cloud that for many years hung over the legitimacy of Lincoln's birth.

The cabin will be in the center of the church. In the cabin will be an altar and a Bible.

When Thomas Lincoln, then twenty-eight years old, and Nancy Hanks, a twenty-three-year-old orphan and domestic, were married in this cabin June 12, 1806, it stood on Beech fork in the adjoining county of Washington. The ceremony was a typical backwoods wedding, with Rev. Jesse Head, a Methodist circuit rider, the officiating clergyman. The cabin was owned by Richard Berry, Nancy's guardian.

There was a Washington county tradition that Lincoln's parents had been married in the "Dick Berry cabin" but there were no records to prove it until 1878, when William F. Brooker, then county clerk, discovered the marriage bond signed by Thomas Lincoln and Berry, dated June 10, 1806, and a marriage return certifying the wedding by Rev. Mr. Head.

Lincoln's Early Years
Long Record of Defeat
Surprising as it may seem, Abraham Lincoln was probably the outstanding failure of American politics of his day until he was past fifty and almost at the threshold of the White House. Only indomitable courage finally carried him to the peak of success, points out H. C. Forbes, summarizing the Emancipator's career in McClure's Magazine.

"At twenty-three Lincoln was defeated as a candidate for the Illinois legislature," notes Forbes. "Before he was thirty he was a candidate for speaker of the house in Illinois and was defeated. Two years later he was defeated a second time for the same office. At thirty-four he was a candidate for congress and was defeated. At thirty-five he was defeated for Presidential elector. At forty he failed to become commissioner of the general land office. At forty-three he was again defeated as a candidate for Presidential elector. At forty-six he ran for the United States senate and was defeated. At forty-seven he was a candidate for the nomination for the Vice Presidency and was defeated. At forty-nine he was defeated a second time as a candidate for the senate."

INDISPOSED?

Headaches come at the most inconvenient times, but there's one thing that will always save the day. If you have some Bayer Aspirin you can soon be on your way. The sooner you take it the less time you'll lose—the less you'll suffer.

Shopping frequently brings on a headache. Over-exertion of any kind. Eye-strain. Or just "nerves." Often it's the time of month. Regardless of the cause, you want relief. And you get relief when you take Bayer Aspirin. Take promptly! It will relieve the pain at any stage, but why wait until you are miserable? Bayer Aspirin can't harm you, because there is nothing harmful in it. Remember this, when you're tempted to try some product that costs a few cents less!

BAYER ASPIRIN

Saving for a rainy day is chiefly intended to secure peace of mind before the rainy day comes. No sensible person wants love that is in danger of being swept away by some trifle.

Fretful DAYS Restless NIGHTS ... give child Castoria

FUSSY, fretful, can't sleep, won't eat... It isn't always easy to find just where the trouble is with a young child. It may be a stomach upset; it may be sluggish bowels.

But when little squiggles are coated and there is even a slight suspicion of bad breath—it's time for Castoria!

Castoria, you know, is a pure vegetable preparation especially made for babies and children. When Baby cries with colic or is fretful because of constipation, Castoria brings quick comfort; and, with relief from pain, soothes him to restful sleep. For older children—up through all the school years—Castoria is equally effective in helping to right irregularities. Just give it in larger doses. What a comfort Castoria is to mothers! Get the genuine, with Chas. H. Fletcher's signature on wrapper and the name Castoria that always appears like this:

"A DAUGHTER OF EVE"

TO SAY of anybody that she is a daughter of Eve is simply to indulge in a flourishing statement to the effect that the person referred to is a woman.

This seems such a natural phrase that one would think it had always been in our language—dating back, in any event, to the time of Eve.

The fact is, however, that we do not find it till it appears in Shakespeare's "Merry Wives of Windsor," published or produced in 1600.

It is possible, of course, if not probable, that the term was part of the English language before; but, at least, Shakespeare gave it literary sanction and probably lent emphasis to its popular usage.

THE WHY OF SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

BURNING LOVE LETTERS

"DON'T burn your love letters or your lover won't marry you," is a superstition which is often heard of and which may be responsible for the mass of cloying correspondence which is often produced in breach of promise suits. The superstition, however, is based on no far-sightedness for the time when "this love grows cold" and is not designed to strengthen the bonds of love through legal proceedings. It is based on quite another idea—the idea of contagious magic, a primitive theory which plays an important role in the world of folklore.

By contact the love letter imbues a certain amount of the "ego" of the writer, and by contact imparts the same to the recipient of the letter. A connecting current, as it were, is set up between the lovers. In more senses than one, the love letter is a "live wire."

Besides this contagious magic there is in a letter what is known in mystic lore as "The mana of names"—that is, a certain magic power which is supposed to reside in a name, written or spoken. Among many primitive peoples today persons are known by a nickname, their real names being kept secret lest some enemy should get possession of them and work them harm through that medium. And among savages there is no closer binding force between two people than an exchange of names. By this exchange the parties exchange identities. In a love letter the name of the writer is likely to appear, and so having this written name—written by himself—the recipient is able to work through it, blinding force over the writer. Now, if you destroy all this you naturally weaken or destroy the magic forces which bind to you your lover—and you lose him.

SOMETHING MORE TO THINK ABOUT

Under the caption, "Something to think about." Some person signing himself, herself, or itself, The Booster, tries to show us that the Eighteenth Amendment is not a good piece of legislation. "It is doubtful if the evils of the corner saloon were much worse than the present evils of the liquor traffic, especially, in places where local option was in force," says "The Booster."

We cannot help wondering if this writer is old enough to remember of the times when we had local option in this country? And when our neighbor county, Allen, when dried up by local option, had its quota of drinkers who left a trail of bottles from Fort Wayne to Payne, Ohio, then wet?

The wet counties had a habit of slopping over into the dry ones. No bartender even inquired of his customer, if he was a resident of a dry county, before accepting pay for a drink.

The corner saloon, had its emiseraries then, as now. Many an old hardened drinker, low in funds, was not averse to helping out a young hopeful, interested in finding out what booze tastes and feels like. The youth, of course, would give him a good stiff shot of the mixture, to show he was no cheap skate of piker.

But the argument that is used by The Booster, the one that is most frequently used by opponents of prohibition is this: "Besides, formerly, the government derived a large amount of revenue from the harmful traffic."

There you have it. Revenue. Did you ever read, Mr. or Mrs. Booster, in the Holy Writ, these words: "Woe unto them that justify the wicked for reward?" Revenue is the reward; pay us, and you may sin. If licensing the liquor business is not "Justifying the wicked for reward," then there is no such thing. License is nothing but an indulgence. The sale of indulgences by the infamous Tetzal, brought before the world the intrepid Martin Luther, who thundered against this most damnable thing. The world honors Luther, but, with wonderful inconsistency, refuses to recognize the parallel that exists between the indulgences sold by Tetzal, and those once sold by the United States government; viz; licenses to operate a saloon.

Then, take thought upon this: since it is obvious that the patron of the saloon, in the end, pays the license, it necessarily follows that the more liberal the patronage, the more this individual contributes toward the cost of running this government, and the less he contributes to his family, who may become public charges.

Any gain here? Are you so selfish that you want your taxes lessened, at the expense of the poor wife and mother, who is the greater sufferer? Shame on you! How true it is, that "The love of money is the root of all evil." And that does not exclude the bootlegger, who is not a product of prohibition, "but is of his father, the devil."

THE TOWN BAND SITUATION

The season is here when the town band usually begins to show signs of life and several members have ask me concerning rehearsals. An explanation of the situation is in order and I submit it as follows:

Seven years ago the directors of the band ask me what my terms would be to take charge of the band. I made them this proposition: $2.00 for each rehearsal and street concert and $5.00 and expenses for day engagements. Price was satisfactory but no arrangements were made to pay the bill. Happily, outside engagements and a generous donation from the Dramatic Club, has carried us ever until the past season when the band was less than expenses. The band now owes me some $45.00 and there is no fund to pay it. Naturally, I no longer care to start another season without some arrangement being made to take care of this condition. However, if some one will come forward with a plan whereby helping season's expenses may be guaranteed, I will take my chances on collecting the old account some way.

The usual expenses of the band for one season are about $125.00 for director and $50.00 for music. Might say in closing that the treasury of the band is very much embarrassed, with the accent on the second syllable.

LIFE HISTORY OF A PIONEER RESIDENT

Isaiah, son of Levi and Harriet Robb Smith, was born near Spencerville, Indiana, Concord, now Spencer Township, on November 23, 1856. He was united in marriage to Eliza Sebert in the fall of 1878, who preceded him in death April 10, 1886.

To this union two sons were born, Samuel of Hicksville, Ohio, and Emery, of Spencerville, Indiana. June 17, 1887 he was united in marriage to Delilah Kniesly and to this union two daughters and one son were born: Mrs. Effie Steward, of Spencerville, Indiana, now deceased, Warren and Mrs. Clara Rhoads at home.

The deceased was stricken with apoplexy on Saturday evening, January 31, 1931 and he never regained consciousness. On Monday afternoon, February 2, 1931, surrounded by loved ones and neighbors, he slept peacefully away, to meet a just God. He always lived on the farm where he was born. He leaves to mourn his departure, the widow, three sons and one daughter.

MODERN FEEDS FOR 1931 BIRDS

(By Jos. H. Bodwell)

Today even in winter time we are able to take our automobile and travel almost any place we wish within a very short time after a heavy snow storm. Why is this so? It is because new machinery has been invented which will clear the roads quickly and surely and thus enable the automobile to travel over the plowed-out roads. It was only a few years ago, however, that this was impossible. This is just an illustration of the important changes that are taking place in our life today.

You will find, however, in some sections a few roads that are not plowed out and these roads it is impossible to travel over during the winter time with an automobile.

There are just as many important and helpful changes that have taken place in the feeding of livestock. This is especially true of mixtures for poultry, both during their growth and laying stages. A few years ago very little stress was laid upon the vitamins, in fact very little was known about them. Today, however, it is one of the things that is very essential in feeding poultry flocks. It is especially essential for growing baby chicks in the early spring, because without sunlight chickens will not thrive unless a plentiful supply of vitamins is furnished.

A few years ago very little was known about the mineral requirement of poultry. Today the value of many different kinds of minerals is known and the best feeders are sure to have incorporated in their feeds these necessary elements that go toward making good bone growth and to keep the bird in good health.

Today we also know the value of having all of the different kinds of protein present and the necessity of having these proteins come from both the animal and vegetable sources.

That the poultryman may be assured that the poultry feed contains all the necessary vitamins, mineral matter and proteins, the mixture must be composed of ingredients from many different sources: such as wheat, oats, corn, meat, fish, milk, cod liver oil, alfalfa, soy beans, lime, bone, iron oxide, potassium iodide, and so forth.

This is comparable to the modern automobile speeding over the plowed-out highway with the good driver at the wheel, even though the roadways may be piled high with snow. Where poor mixtures are used, even though there may be good management, the poultryman is forced to struggle along against adverse conditions and faulty growth of birds just as one might struggle with a good car through side roads drifted with snow.

SERVE YOURSELF—AND SAVE

An Important Message to You And Your Loved Ones

WHEN you realize that nearly SIXTY per cent of the expense part of life insurance premiums is used to pay for SELLING the insurance to you—$603,538,769.97 during 1929 alone—you will instantly grasp the great importance TO YOU of this message.

Time was when life insurance—the safest and best plan for protecting your loved ones—needed to be sold by salesmen.

That time is PAST! Today everyone knows that legal reserve life insurance is an absolute family necessity, and it is now eagerly BOUGHT, rather than sold.

Many thousands of thrifty people the country over are literally flooding the Union Mutual Life with more than sixty millions in applications for its wonderful new policy which you can obtain WITHOUT MEDICAL EXAMINATION—WITHOUT PAYING HIGHER PREMIUMS TO COVER HIGH PERSONAL SELLING COSTS—WITHOUT EXPENSE OF ANY KIND—at the astoundingly low quarterly investment of $4.13 for $1,000.00 of life and $5,000.00 of accident insurance at age 35, with disability benefits and many additional advantages included—premiums for all other ages from 10 to 60 years being in exact proportion as shown below; and you can get as much as $5,000.00 of life, with $25,000.00 of accident protection at this surprisingly small cost of a few pennies a day which will NEVER INCREASE.

Easily—conveniently—privately—WITHOUT MEDICAL EXAMINATION OR AGENTS TO TAKE UP YOUR TIME—you can now secure one of the finest of all life insurance policies—and as soon as you mail the handy coupon printed below, the policy will come to you for your FREE INSPECTION. Not one cent of expense or obligation.

And when you have seen the policy, you are sure to be as enthusiastic about it as Attorney Henry B. Colburn of Cheyenne, Wyo., who says:

Prints Foretell Coming of Spring

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Long before the first robin there are signs of spring clearly visible to the fashion-wise. Even now the signs are many, such as for instance the bright silk frocks, both print and plain which in their refreshingly new colors, foretell the coming of spring.

Advance spring messages bespeak gay plaids printed on the bias for a new and slenderizing look and smart in jackets, blouses, scarfs and skirts to ensemble with a contrasting plain color. Dots achieve fresh importance as touches of bright accent on a dark dress (see gown pictured), or in jacket suits and ensembles for later wear without a coat. Sophisticated two-color prints have the design silhouetted in a single color on a contrasting background.

All signs point to a blue season, and

Hints for Housekeepers

Hot cranberry sauce is good with waffles on wintry mornings.

Plenty of fresh fruits and vegetables in the diet aids the family's appetite.

Now that the eggs and milk are relatively cheap, they can be used economically in the low-cost diet.

A broom placed just outside the door and used for brushing snow from the feet saves work for the housewife.

Because only a little food value is lost in the drying process dried fruits are a satisfactory addition to the winter diet.

The stout woman should emphasize vertical lines in her clothes and not wear colors that will make her conspicuous.

To stimulate a love of reading in the child, see that he has a comfortable chair of suitable size and a good light beside it.

The majority is wicked.—Blas.

The purplish tones of navy, such as fleet blue and pilot blue, will be in the lead. Other tones all the way to the palest watery tints of aqua blue and aqua marine will appear as accents or entire dresses to contrast with dark coats.

There are two important groups in silk weaves for spring—the crepes and the heavy sheers. The French couturiers favor canton faille crepes for morning and town wear because frocks of these heavy crepes look well under a coat for early spring, and with a fur piece or scarf later on.

Every wise wardrobe will have at least one dress of heavy sheer crepe. These luxurious weaves combine the supple grace of a sheer fabric with the flattering depth of color which is generally associated with heavy silk. Crepe-andante, a triple flat chiffon, and crepe cantha, a triple crepe of the georgette type, are examples of this trend to thick sheer weaves with a mat surface.

An early spring costume of monotone crepe from the showings of a Paris couturier is here illustrated. Polka dot crepe edged with little pleated ruffles lends a bright note of color in the scarf and under blouse, the entire displaying an entirely new silhouette. These narrow pleatings are ever so smart and they are lavished on spring frocks.

Training the Children in Use of Money

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

A very simple method of training children in the use of their allowances is that employed by social service agencies in dealing with foreign or illiterate families. It consists of several envelopes—preferably stout manila for durability—one for each kind of expenditure. Two would be enough for a child at first, one marked "To spend" and one "To save for something nice."

Many parents give their children a few pennies each week when they are as young as four or five years old. When a child has learned to make change, to add or subtract amounts, and can be sent to the store, he is old enough to have some money of his own to handle. The envelope system is a help until he can write his "accounts" down in a book. Then he should be taught gradually how to find out what he has spent and what

Comfortable Shoes Are Important

Think first of how your shoes feel rather than how they look is one of the late advice of health specialists. To permit free action of the feet, shoes should be loose and flexible. Tight or short shoes press the toes together so that the muscles and bones lose their strength, and the toes become deformed.

Two rules to remember are: Toe straight ahead, using the large toe as a lever; never toe out and keep the weight on the outer border of the foot.

Exercise often helps foot troubles. These exercises should be taken in the bare feet two or three times a day. First pull the toes in and under as if picking up something—repeat thirty or forty times; pick up marbles or pencils with the toes; walk pigeon-toed; walk slowly on the outer borders of the feet with toes turned in.

Sandman Story for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

The fairies went to different parts of the woods and some went to the park in the cities, and whispered to the snow which was falling fast:

"Now you know, old snow, that you can be very, very cold if you want to be."

"You know, too, that you can be really quite warm if you will only fall where you will be a shelter from Mr. North Wind."

"Mr. North Wind, we know, is never warm. He is always tearing around so much himself and blowing and raging so much that he just keeps warm himself and is too busy to think about others."

"But we will tell you what to do, old snow."

"Here, in the woods, you fall around the trees. Don't cover up the holes and hollows where the rabbits can get shelter, but fall around the hollows so the rabbits can crawl in and get nice and warm."

"Then fall in just that way around the homes of the little squirrels, and the homes of the birds who have come too early, or of the little sparrows who have such a long winter trying to keep warm."

"In the cities watch the trees where the little birds go, and be very careful, oh, so careful, not to cover up the holes."

"Fall so you will make a big strong fort where the little animals can creep inside."

Now the snow decided it would do just as the fairies had asked. It fell steadily all day.

Snow banks, snow drifts, everywhere there was snow. The trees were heavy with it, the ground was covered deep with it. Little boys and girls who had put away their sleds until next winter brought them out and began sliding down the hills as quickly as they could.

But the little birds and the little animals couldn't get warm sliding down hill.

They couldn't get warm like grown-ups who could wear heavy coats and wraps.

They couldn't get warm as horses could who had kind masters to put rugs over them as they waited in the streets.

As soon as the little creatures felt Mr. North Wind and saw that it was beginning to snow, they trembled and shook all over.

They thought that they would feel the cold so much after the warm weather.

But to their great surprise, they didn't feel cold at all! They found all the little holes and hollows protected from the snow.

At first they went inside, always looking out to see that the snow didn't bury them.

When the snow saw the squirrels in the parks whisking their bushy tails and heard them say:

"The snow is really lovely and not a bit cold," and heard the little birds whispering:

"This is wonderful, we don't shiver at all," the snow was ever so glad it had fallen as the fairies had asked. And oh, it felt so nice to have the cool snow again and the fresh clear-air.

It was lovely!

Curtains for the Short Windows

Problem of Arranging Curtains Nicely Met.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

It is sometimes a problem to curtain short windows in a small living room successfully, especially if there are bookcases or radiators under any of the windows. One solution is to place more or less determines the length of all the curtains in the room. The problem has been pleasingly met in this living room photographed by the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture. Both glass curtains and side draperies are carried to the lower edge of the window casing, but the overdraperies are slightly looped back to make the effect less severe. The inner edge of these draperies is kept as straight as possible, paralleling the vertical lines of the window.

As the ceiling of the room is low and the windows short, no valance should be used with these curtains.

Vertical lines are made to predominate to give height to the room, not only in the curtains themselves, but also through the up-and-down edges of the books, the straight candlestick, and even the sections of the radiator under the second window.

The walls of the room are of plain creamy tan paper, so it is suitable to introduce some color and pattern in the curtains. Rayon damask was selected for the overdraperies, and sheer marguerite for the glass curtains. The latter are made with a casing for the rod and a one-inch heading. Fullness in the outer curtains is laid in pinch pleats and attached to the rod by means of hooks on the under side. One advantage of making the glass curtains as long as the other pair, reaching below the window sill, is that they do not blow out so readily when the window is open.

Good Things for the Table

By NELLIE MAXWELL

A haze on the far horizon. An infinite, tender sky. The ripe, rich tints of the corn-field.

And the wild geese sailing high! And all over the lowland and upland.

The bliss of the golden-pod: Some of us call it Nature. And some of us call it—God.

—William Carruth.

The following are a few meat dishes which are prepared in ways that are different:

Braised Mutton.—Take three pounds of the breast of mutton—shoulder or loin may be used. Remove the surplus fat and cut the meat into strips. Lay four slices of bacon in a casserole, add the meat and brown well on all sides. Cover the meat with sliced lemon and four more slices of bacon. Add one small onion sliced thin, three carrots sliced, one cupful of celery diced. Pour over one cupful of soup stock and add salt and pepper. Cover closely and bake two and one-half hours. Tomato with a half teaspoonful of sugar may be substituted for the soup stock.

Braised Oxtails.—Wash thoroughly three oxtails cut into pieces. Dredge with flour and brown in the fat to which a slice of onion has been added. Add two cupfuls of tomatoes and water to cover, one teaspoonful of salt. Simmer for three hours closely covered. Remove the oxtails, thicken the gravy and serve with the gravy poured over the oxtails. More salt will be needed to season the meat during the cooking.

Tripe Roll.—For those who are fond of tripe this recipe will be welcome: Take two pounds of tripe in one piece (boiled). Roll, wash and season four large potatoes, add a tablespoonful of chopped onion, two cupfuls of soft bread crumbs, one-half of a green pepper chopped, one pincho of pepper, one teaspoonful of salt and pepper and paprika to taste. Mix this mixture and spread over the tripe, roll tightly and tie with string. Roll in melted fat and flour and lay on strips of bacon. Bake for an hour in a hot oven and serve in slices with tomato sauce.

Rice Waffles.—Sift one and one-half cupfuls of flour, three tablespoonfuls of sugar, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt and four teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Work into this three-fourths of a cupful of cold boiled rice. Add the well beaten egg yolk mixed with one and one-half cupfuls of milk and two tablespoonfuls of shortening or oil. Fold in the stiffly beaten egg white and bake on a hot waffle iron.

Rose Salad.—Take apples after coring and peeling and simmer in a little sirup to which a handful of red cinnamon candies have been added. When tender remove, fill the centers with nuts and raisins, place on lettuce and serve with a good cream dressing.

THE STORY

Returning to London, practically penniless, after an unsuccessful business trip, Sir George Sandison takes dinner with his widowed stepmother, his old nurse, "Aunt," and his sister, "Lucy." He did not approve of her marriage to his father, but her explanation satisfies him. Little is left of the estate, and Lady Sandison proposes that they go to the United States to visit her brother, Robert MacBeth, wealthy contractor. Sir George agrees. MacBeth lives on an island estate with his daughter, Roberta, who longs for city life. MacBeth is a victim of arthritis and almost helpless. MacBeth is glad to see his sister and asks the two to stay. Roberta is keeping a date with Jack Navarro, about whom she knows little. MacBeth arranges for his sister to take charge of the household and George to act as secretary. Roberta does not approve of the arrangement. She tells her father she is not interested in George, while the young man takes an air of indifference to her.

CHAPTER IV.—Continued

"Quite a watchdog," observed Roberta scornfully, but she swung to her feet and went to the doorway and looked out. Yes, it was Jack. What was he doing here? She had written him that she could not meet him until next Monday.

"Want to send him a message? It can be done."

"No," said Roberta, feeling instantly that he thought she was afraid her father might see her and ask questions. "I can manage my own affairs, thanks."

"Absolutely," agreed Sir George and moved away.

To her astonishment he went through the doorway and toward the house. Roberta was so amazed that she could not make even the faintest move to stop him. She was annoyed. She was quite unused to such treatment. Here was she, the only girl he knew, apparently, this side of the Atlantic, any way the only girl he knew in this place, and instead of improving the shining hour, he came to her and delivered his message as casually as though they were two schoolboys and then walked off and left her!

Roberta walked slowly toward the beach and the bridge. Jack had seen her now. He moved toward her. He looked worried. Was he afraid of her father? Why hadn't he come directly to the island and asked for her, like any other boy she knew? The sunlight struck across his face, and showed her lines she had never seen before. Why, he was much older than she had thought. He was not a boy, he was a man.

Jack stood his ground near a tall sycamore and a thicket of sumac which screened him. He beckoned to her eagerly. Why couldn't he meet her in the open?

Robert MacBeth was frowning when Sir George joined him. He looked up quickly as the younger man came toward him.

"Wouldn't you like to try a bit of exercise?" Sir George asked. "Suppose you take my arm."

"Maybe I'd better," MacBeth agreed reluctantly, "though I'm dashed unwilling to stir. Well, once around, if you're bent for exercise."

"Once around it is," Sir George told him encouragingly. "We'll have you dancing in no time."

It would give the girl a chance, Sir George thought to himself, his eyes seeking the path to the bridge. Yes, there she went. It might be that the wisest course would be to warn the father, but he could not bring himself to do it. The girl was plucky. She had not asked him to keep quiet or anything of that kind. He could either keep his mouth shut, or go to blazes for all of her. Well, he would keep his mouth shut.

Slowly and painfully, leaning heavily on the strong young arm that supported him, Robert MacBeth made his way along the terrace. When they reached his chaise longue again, he relaxed gratefully as the younger man helped him to a comfortable position, and arranged his pillows.

There was a short silence. Sir George lit a cigarette and leaned against the wicker chair he intended to slide into in a moment. He could not see the girl now, and the car had disappeared.

Robert MacBeth had taken up a letter he had laid down just before his promenade. He handed it to his secretary.

"What do you think of that?" It was a typewritten letter addressed to "Robt MacBeth" and said:

"Dear Sir: Do you know the man your daughter is meeting at different resorts on the Lincoln highway? Many facts in your life are known to a writer of this, which you would not like to find public property. If you want to know all the writer knows send letter to the P. O. Box given below and wait for telegram appointing meeting place. All will be told you." It was unsigned, merely the number of the post office box, 0111, in a small Pennsylvania city, being given.

Sir George handed it back. "I'd throw it in the fire."

Robert MacBeth grasped the letter firmly. "That's where you would be wrong. Such letters should be kept and used to trap the writer or writers. I'll send it to a detective agency. It isn't scandal I'm afraid of. I've never done anything to be blackmailed for and neither has Roberta."

"Then why should you bother?"

MacBeth turned an honestly worried face to the younger man. "I'm pretty sure that the writer of this letter has some connection with the difficulty I've been having with my payroll, but I can't convince the police."

"Payroll?" Sir George looked at him in astonishment. "Do you mean the payroll for your employees in the city?"

Robert MacBeth shook his head. "Not the office. A much bigger thing. The money for the men on the construction job. You will likely laugh at the idea that this has anything to do with it, but though I've tried to, somehow I can't succeed in laughing very hard. I have a feeling these letters have some connection with a gang of men who mean to have a try for the payroll again, if they can't get at me and my money this way." He shook the letter.

"But surely you've taken precautions? Why not pay the men by check?"

Robert MacBeth made a wholly contemptuous gesture with his hand, which still held the letter. "Use your head. I can't pay laborers by check. Lots of the foremen don't know what to do with checks. No, we've got to make and keep things safe ourselves."

He looked at Sir George, and, leaning toward him and in a low tone, said: "It's all right in New York. I can get protection, armored cars if need be, but I've a hunch there's trouble brewing for me and I've got a great many thousands of dollars to pay out on the big piece of construction work being done up the river. It's how to get the money there safely that is puzzling me now."

He paused a moment and said quietly: "I don't mind telling you that I have the sum deposited in the nearest local bank. I'm going to send some one down to collect it from the bank later and that some one may be you."

He looked at Sir George questioningly. "Yes, of course, but when and how?"

"That's what I want you to tell me. I'd like you to go down with Roberta today and look over the lay of the land."

"Can't your man take me?" Sir George asked. "Might find out more that way."

"I don't want the servants to know or suspect anything about it, nor the people in the village. In fact, I don't want anybody to know anything about it, except possibly Roberta."

"Must she know? Why drag a girl into this?"

"Roberta won't be dragged in," her father promised him. "But I want her to take you down the river to the bank and up the river to show you where the money is to be taken."

"By motor?"

"Yes."

"You're sure you wouldn't let the girl drive if there was likelihood of danger?"

"No, but you could drive yourself, once you knew the way."

"Oh, yes."

"Well, go with her to the village and to the bank, where she will cash a check and introduce you to the cashier. Then tomorrow she'll take you up the river."

"Have you told her this?"

"Not yet. Why?"

"It's barely possible she may have made arrangements of her own."

"She'll change that if I ask her," her father said easily.

"Ah—"

"Sir George was not aware himself of how much he put in that 'Ah.' It was sufficient to make Robert MacBeth turn his head quickly and survey the young man. Having turned it he saw that the young man's eyes were fixed on a spot of blue. MacBeth was presently able to observe that this was a car on the high road over on the mainland and that opposite that car was a dim blur that had a bronze color. He remembered the color of the dress his daughter had been wearing that morning and turned his head so that the younger man might not see his face. Sir George continued to "watch the bronze blur until it took shape and outline and began to look like Roberta MacBeth. Then he started, aware that the silence had been long."

"You were saying?"

"That I'll tell Roberta what I want as soon as she crosses the river. Or will you meet her and tell her I want to see her? And take yourself off for a time."

"Absolutely."

Sir George sauntered toward the river and met the flushed and exultant looking girl.

"Saying?"

His look was enough to make her feel ashamed of herself.

"Oh, I say," she said. "That was unfair and I didn't really mean it."

Sir George did not stop. "It doesn't matter," he said stiffly. "Your father is waiting to see you."

The girl angrily kicked a rock off the towpath into the canal. "Well, if you want to be hateful, be hateful."

He turned. "If you would only get it into your extraordinarily pretty little head," he told her not unkindly, "that I'm here because I have to earn my living and your father has been good enough to give me a post—that's that. As for you and your friends, at the risk of being thought rude, I tell you that I don't give a tinker's d—n whom you meet or where you meet him, and that's all of that."

There had been a quickly drawn breath and then silence and he had walked on over the canal bridge to the highway, feeling completely ashamed of himself. Why had he lost his temper? His remorse gaining on him, he was about to turn once more when the sound of flying footsteps came to him. He turned to confront an angry and flame-cheeked girl, who told him vehemently: "You've just got to know this. You don't hate me one degree less or more than I hate you."

"Well, since we know it's mutual," said Sir George evenly, "suppose we go on, hating each other as much as we like in private, and keep a friendly smile to face the world." He smiled at her now.

"Oh, you're hateful!" the girl cried. "Just when I meant to be decent to you for father's sake, you make it impossible. I promise you I'll do anything I can to speed your return to Bonnie Scotland."

"Ah," returned the homesick Sir George, his heart in his voice, "if you only could."

The girl looked at him speechless a moment and yet she did not go. He wondered why, but almost before he had done wondering he suddenly saw the answer to his question. The blue car was some little way ahead of him, on the tree-shaded cross road to the highway, and its owner was struggling frantically to start it.

That was why she thought he was spying; that was why she would not, if she could help it, leave him alone.

He continued to walk toward the car and to speak so that the man, whoever he was, might hear. "Surely you don't want to annoy your father and have him question you, do you? As for the blue car and its owner," he continued, "it is hardly my affair."

The man at the car jerked his head up and nodded to the girl and then quickly turned his back and bustled himself with the car again.

Sir George waited for a moment. Surely any decent sort would be likely to come over and speak—make it easy for the girl to introduce him. The man, however, after that one look hurried back to work at the car, his face resolutely turned from Sir George. The girl, looking first at one and then at the other, slowly turned and went toward her father's house.

Sir George walked away past the car. What sort of cheap and awful person that little devil had elected as hero of her secret romance, he now had a pretty fair idea. The man's face, though good-looking in its way, was an open book to Sir George.

Sir George wondered why the fellow had been so anxious as to try to hide his face, so anxious to avoid any speech with him. He stopped dead in the middle of the road for a moment as the solution occurred to him. It must have been that he was afraid, since he had seen Sir George first, of recognition. Then the fellow must be some one whom he himself would recognize. He walked on thoughtfully. (TO BE CONTINUED)

Salt Important Part in Rites of Sacrifice

The first accredited mention of salt appears in the first books of Moses, where it is referred to as an essential part in many of the sacrifices of the Jews. The most familiar Bible reference to salt is in Genesis ix, 26, in which Lot's wife was turned into a pillar of that valuable commodity—probably to the great enjoyment of the goats, sheep and cattle of that district.

The next most familiar Bible reference to salt is that in Matthew v, 12: "If the salt has lost his savor, where-with shall it be salted?" Other references in the New Testament are Mark ix, 46-50, and Colossians iv, 6. Homer, 800 years before Christ, speaks of salt in the Greek sacrificial rites; no sacrifice was complete without it. Herodotus, who was born in 484 B. C., says the Egyptians ate salted food, including raw fish that was first steeped in brine and then sun-dried. They must have been exactly like the Gloucester salt fish of today, or the Provincetown scull-fish. The Egyptians also ate raw duck and quail, salted in similar fashion.—Boston Globe.

Childish Speech

Elizabeth Cleveland says that the child begins to use single words at from ten months to a year old. At twenty-three months he should be using simple phrases. By the time he is three he has a large vocabulary (500 to 1,500 words), and can converse well enough for his own practical purposes.

Needs to Pause

FIRST PRIZE... White Loaf Cake FIRST PRIZE... Baking Powder Biscuits SECOND PRIZE... Banana Pie

Won by MRS. C. E. LE CRONE
at the Vernon Parish Fair

"These were the only culinary entries I made, so I feel highly pleased at my success—due not altogether to my skill, but equally to the superior quality of the Gold Medal 'Kitchen-tested' Flour used. This was my first experience with Gold Medal and I had to go up against some mighty stiff competition as there are some fine pastry cooks in Leesville."

A Flour That's Virtually Mistake-Proof—Because It's "Kitchen-tested" in Advance

TODAY more women are using GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Flour than any other brand. Chiefly because they find this all-purpose flour always gives uniform good results, whenever and however they use it. It will bring this same success in your baking, because all GOLD MEDAL Flour is "Kitchen-tested" before it comes to you. Breads, cakes, biscuits, pastries are baked from every batch—in a home oven just like your own. And only the flour that successfully passes this "Kitchen-test" is allowed to go out to you. You get only the flour that has been tested for baking success in advance.

Muscular Pains Frequently Due to Congestion

When you have Rheumatic or Muscular Pains in the back, chest or limbs try this simple treatment. Congestion (back of blood flow) is the usual cause of pains in the muscular tissues. Hoff's Liniment, a powerful stimulant brings a quick flow of blood to the painful area, relieving congestion and resulting pain. Get a bottle of Hoff's Liniment and apply it with brisk rubbing. Then apply a cloth saturated with the liniment to the painful area and in a few minutes you will feel the warming and stimulating effect of this powerful liniment.

If you do not get relief in 30 minutes your druggist will refund the purchase price. Large 8 ounce bottles cost only 60 cents. If your druggist cannot supply you, just send 60 cents to the Goodrich-Sambie Company, Saint Paul, Minnesota, and it will be sent postpaid by return mail.

In Another Girl's Shoes

By SIDNEY BLAIR

(Copyright.)

MARJORIE ABBOTT almost ran along the street, through the early morning crowds. She had just wrenched the heel off one of her pumps. She had to stop at the shoemaker's and have it fixed, and that would make her late to the office—late, too, for all the other things that must be crowded into her busy day. She wanted to get in some shopping before late afternoon, when she was to have tea with Geoff; must get it in, in fact, for she wanted to look her very best. Not that Geoff would notice, in all probability. He never had seemed to notice what she was wearing in the old days back home. It was three years since she had seen him. He'd changed in lots of ways, most likely, living abroad and traveling a lot and all that.

The shoemaker was bent low over a delicate little pump when Marjorie hurried into his shop. She explained that she must have her shoe fixed at once. She'd had to walk the last half block with one heel off, and she couldn't possibly go on that way! Her shoes were rather square, low-heeled ones, but even so it had been difficult. "But I can't fix that now, Miss," he told her. "I've got a rush order here—two rush orders—and my daughters getting married this noon, and I've got to go home for that."

Marjorie looked at him in despair. "But what can I do?" she cried.

He glanced down at her feet, and then reached to a low shelf and held out a shoe to her. It was a patent leather, slim, high-heeled pump, and a wide buckle made it seem even narrower and slimmer than it was.

"Try this," he told her. "Just slip it on; I think it'll fit."

"I never wear shoes like that," she told him. "I wear just flat, low-heeled ones. Anyway, it isn't mine."

"No, but it's mine, to sell, maybe," he told her. "A customer of mine sprained her ankle, and she's got to wear low-heeled shoes for a year after it gets well, and she asked me if I couldn't keep all her high-heeled ones here, and maybe sell them to one of my customers. They're beautiful shoes, Miss."

Marjorie glanced at a clock. Even later than she'd thought! She took the shoe and slipped it on quickly. It did fit—but how funny it looked with her thick stockings. Oh well—she must get to the office.

At first it was hard to get used to the high-heeled shoes; then gradually she began to like the feeling of them. By noon, when she went on the shop-pling tour, she was wondering why she hadn't ever had even one pair of high-heeled shoes.

She was going to buy her new suit—a sensible tweed, she'd decided; the kind of suit she always bought. But the sensible tweeds all looked wrong, somehow, with that other girl's shoes. "Just try this one, Miss," the saleswoman suggested. It was a dark blue suit, with a touch of red in the collar and cuffs, and its material was soft and clinging. Marjorie tried it on, and marveled at the effect. In the end she bought it.

She arrived a little early at the hotel where she was to meet Geoff, but he was there. He looked at her, looked away, then back again, and as she smiled, came forward eagerly.

"Marjorie! I didn't know you. How you've changed!" he exclaimed. "I can hardly believe it's you!"

He led her to the tearoom, where they sat in wide, deep chairs at a low table where a bowl of roses bloomed among the tea things.

"You used to be so, well, so sort of sensible looking; as if you never could be frivolous," he told her. "It sort of scared me, because I'm heavily inclined toward frivolity, you might say. But now you're just the same, and yet you seem to be so much gayer."

Marjorie wondered what he'd say if he knew that it was her clothes, bought just that day, that had made the change in her. She was playing up to them, to the lovely suit that wasn't a "sensible tweed," to the hat, to that other girl's shoes, to their beautiful buckles and their long, slim laces.

"Do you know, Marjorie, even your feet have changed," he told her. "You used to wear such sensible looking shoes; sometimes I wished that I could tell you not to hide your pretty feet in them."

Marjorie smiled at him. Why not tell him the truth?

But it was days later when she did tell him about that other girl's shoes, days of which she had spent many hours with Geoff, at luncheon, tea, dinner, even at breakfast!

And days during which she had learned that Geoff had always liked her, better than he did anyone else, but had been scared off by his fear that she was too sensible to care for a "lightweight" like him.

"You're not a lightweight," she told him indignantly. "You're wonderful."

"Go right on thinking so, my wife-to-be," he told her. "And I'll forgive you for fooling me so long, and keeping me out of paradise."

ST. JOE YOUNG MAN PASSES SUDDENLY

Burl Estel Rude, second child of John and Ellen Rude, was born in Putnam County, Ohio, August 13, 1895 and departed this life at the home of his parents, east of Newville, Indiana, February 7, 1931, aged 35 years, 5 months and 24 days.

On February 26, 1921 Mr. Rude was united in marriage with Miss Vienna Haverstock of Goshen, Indiana. To this union two children were born, Burl Junior and Mary Ellen.

At the age of 15 years the subject of this sketch united with the United Brethren Church at Mt. Pleasant.

When the World War broke out Burl felt the urge of the call to the colors and the plea of the allies and enlisted on May 27, 1918 and served nine months overseas in Battery A in the Field Artillery from which he received an honorable discharge which ought always to be a splendid memorial to the loved ones of his service and sacrifice in the cause of democracy.

He leaves in his passing the faithful wife, and two children of St. Joe, the father and mother of Newville and one brother of Concord, other relatives and a host of friends.

The funeral was held from the St. Joe Christian Church, Tuesday afternoon at 1:30, with Rev. Adrich of Butler officiating. Burial in the K. of P. Riverside cemetery under the direction of E. R. Kinsey.

CARD OF THANKS

In our state of sadness, we pause to express our thanks to our many friends and neighbors, for their sympathy.

Wife and Children, Father and Mother, Brother and Wife.

Formation of Tree "Rings"

It is well known that the growth of a tree in diameter is shown in the so-called "rings" of annual growth. These rings are simply the material that is added around the tree underneath the bark each year. The outer cells, just inside the bark make up the living, active portion of the tree and each year's product is plainly marked off from that of the preceding year. It is in this manner that the rings are formed.

Vacation Echo

Daughter accompanied the family on a vacation trip and several very interesting places were referred to as historical spots. On returning home the family was discussing the trip with friends when the youthful traveler exclaimed, "Oh mother, don't forget to tell them about all those wonderful hysterical places we visited!"

European Scientists Wrong

A British official of East Africa says that African medicine men linked the mosquito with malaria when European scientists still thought the disease due to inhaling gases from swampy lands.

REVIEW OF ACTIVITIES OF THE STATE LEGISLATURE

Indianapolis, Feb. 11.—With half of its life past, the State Legislature started this week facing the task of enacting all of its major legislation that is expected of it during the half that remains.

As the members resumed their work, the Republican Senate was chiding the Democratic House, where revenue-raising legislation must originate, for delaying tax reform on which the seventy-five Democrat Representatives won their election. With its own hands tied by the State Constitution so far as originating tax legislation, the Senate went so far that it set aside yesterday for a discussion of tax matters. All this served apparently as a spur to the House, for Chairman Linke of its ways and means committee promised that two new revenue bills—the income tax and corporation tax—would be ready for consideration on the floor this week.

The Senate also was not content with merely chiding the House for delay, but in addition pushed ahead legislation intended to curb public expenditures. A caucus of the Republican Senators put them behind the Beckett-Huff bill which would effect a 10 per cent cut in local tax levies for the next two years. The bill is introduced by Senator Joe Rand Beckett of Indianapolis, one of the Senate leaders, who was a member of Governor Leslie's Tax Survey Commission, and Senator Byron Huff, who is chairman of the State Budget Committee, that denied more than $7,000,000 asked for expenses of the State institutions and departments during the next two years. The Beckett-Huff bill, in addition to cutting tax levies, permits local tax officials to suspend or reduce various existing mandatory levies.

The House has been somewhat engrossed with political bills. Chairman Peters of the Democratic State Committee is pushing a bill to have separate ballots printed for presidential elections, or have a separate row for them on the voting machines. There is not enough room on the face of voting machines to permit all being done that is asked by the State Chairman, but paper ballots and an increased number of voting precincts would carry out his wishes with an increased cost of many thousands of dollars for election expenses. The State alone, according to the Printing Board, would have to spend between $10,000 and $12,000 at each election for paper ballots alone. Mr. Peters also is pressing adoption of a state-wide voters' registration law. It would cause expenditure of probably $500,000, one item—the registration of voters' names—alone amounting to about $90,000. Mr. Peters regards these bills as platform pledges, as also the "old age pension" bill, which is the only measure of great importance to the State at large that has passed the House. As soon as passed, the Republican Senators agreed to defer consideration to await the House decision on how to finance it. But, as yet, this decision is as far off as when the House passed the bill, and yesterday the Senate took up debate on the measure. It probably will not pass in the form that it left the House.

One amusing incident thus far was the manner in which the Republican floor leader in the House, Representative James M. Knapp of Hagerstown, saved the Democratic income tax measure. An income tax bill introduced by a Republican before the Democratic platform measure came before the House for consideration, and a motion was made for its indefinite postponement.

"Mr. Speaker," said Mr. Knapp, gaining the floor, "I suppose you realize that if this bill is indefinitely postponed, the same subject cannot be considered again this session?"

The Democrats, hastily realizing their error, withdrew the motion. Later, when the platform measure was introduced, it was found unsatisfactory by the ways and means committee, which decided to adopt instead the principles advocated in the bill prepared by the Governor's Tax Survey Commission.

The clogged condition of the legislative machinery of the House has given the leaders considerable worry. Speaker Myers called attention to the lack of progress.

"We are adjourning early," he said, "to give the committees an opportunity to meet and dispose of bills."

Only two of the fifty-nine committees met, however, after the House adjourned.

By accepting the invitation extended by Mrs. Everett Mavis of Auburn to hold a club meeting at her home, February 4, the L. L. C. ladies did themselves an exceptionally good turn. About twenty members met at The News office in St. Joe. From here everybody went together in a school bus to Auburn. The trip was entertaining in itself, especially when, on the way home, the "girls" began to demonstrate their vocal accomplishments, learned in former days.

Since Mrs. Mavis is an officer of the county Federation, the program for the evening resolved itself into an informal discussion of the duties of an individual club to the larger organization. The members were interested to learn how they could more nearly conform to Federation ideals, and also, to learn that many of the past programs will count directly toward Federation work.

The vocal quartet of the club, comprised of Mrs. Wm. Staman and Mrs. Fred Leighty, sopranos, and Miss Helen Dittmars and Mrs. LaVonne DeVore, altos, sang "Love's Old Sweet Song" and "Sweet and Low."

Surely every one will agree that the thanks voted to Mrs. Mavis and Mrs. Sechler at the meeting was not only a formal procedure but instead was the deepest expression from the hearts of all who attended.

SURPRISE PARTY

If when your mother tells you to go upstairs, and when you turn on the light you find a goodly part of the population of St. Joe standing at the head of the stairs and you are eating a doughnut, what should you do? Eat the doughnut and grin. That is just what DuWayne Kinsey did last Tuesday evening, February 3. Since DuWayne's birthday was not until the fourth, the party held at the home of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. E. R. Kinsey, was a complete surprise.

All of the basketball players, the seniors, and the high school teachers with their families were invited. The evening was most pleasantly spent in games and contests. Later the hostess served a very tastefully prepared lunch of sandwiches, pineapple, fruit, pickles, cake and coffee. The decorations of red and white were appropriate to Valentine's Day and were so favorable comment.

After midnight the guests took the opportunity to congratulate DuWayne in a very real fashion on his reaching his seventeenth birthday anniversary. In addition to the fun the really sincere wishes for many returns of this happy event were voiced by all before leaving.

POOR MAN'S BUTTER OR RICH MAN'S GRAFT

It is really the poor man's butter or the rich man's graft? "Now what is oleomargarine? How is it made? Does any man want to feed his children on it? Let us see."

Oleomargarines are made from skimmed milk, coconut oil or tallow and salt. The main ingredient is skimmed milk, which has no fat or self-sustaining substances.

Now let us look into the ingredients. Many margarines are advertised as the "white meat of the coconut." Coconut oil such as used in American oleo is made from copra. Copra is dried coconut meat, but let us see the condition of the stuff before it is refined.

Copra comes from the Philippine Islands. The coconuts fall from the trees, and are broken open and the meat dried in heaps under the tropical sun. This is called copra.

When dry, copra looks and smells something like stable manure, or worse. When the stuff is ready for shipment, swarms of half-naked Malays load it on ships, tramping it in the holds of vessels with their bare feet. An army of Malays sweating under tropical heat, tramping copra that is going to be made into the poor man's butter. Think of it!

When copra arrives at America, it is run out of the ships with conveyors. Generally it is piled up in the open where it attracts millions of flies and looks exactly like piles of stable manure and smells a darn sight worse.

This compost is then ground and pressed between steam heated rollers. The raw oil is the most rancid and evil-smelling thing in the world. Until recently it was used exclusively for soap grease.

Scientists discovered ways of refining it. The process is simple. First, the oil is heated to a very high degree. It is then placed in vats and large quantities of sodium injected. The rancidity attacks the sodium solution and is eaten away. The oil is then treated with ether, which process solidifies the oil.

And this is the stuff they advertise as the "white meat of the coconut."

Here is the recipe for making 1,000 pounds of oleo:

700 pounds of coconut oil at 6 1/2 cents, $45.50; 30 gallons of skimmed milk, $1.50; 51 pounds of salt, $1.00; total $48.00.

Did you ever stop to think it requires five pounds of oleo to furnish the nourishment for the human system that one pound of butter will furnish.

SPENCERVILLE LADY PASSES AFTER LONG ILLNESS

Lydia Watson, daughter of Charles and Rachel Watson, original settlers in Jackson Township, was born June 7, 1849. In childhood she united with the Old Perseverance Methodist Episcopal Church in Jackson Township. Under the pastorate of Rev. J. S. Nelson she united with the Spencerville Lutheran Church where she has been a consistently faithful member and supporter of the Lord's work. Her life has been of service and helpfulness among her own people where her lot was cast.

About twelve years ago she and her brother, Charles Watson, moved to Spencerville. She was willing that her sabbath be what she has lived. She is survived by two brothers, Charles Watson of Spencerville, and Jessie Watson of Jackson Township; two nieces and three nephews; and great nieces and nephews. She passed into the life beyond on Saturday morning, February the 14th aged 81 years, 8 months and 7 days.

The funeral was held from the Lutheran Church, Monday afternoon conducted by Rev. Stoll, with burial in White City Cemetery.

RURAL PRESS HOLD- ING THE LINE

According to a survey made by Ernest H. Cherrington, general secretary of the World League Against Alcoholism, the rural press, and the newspapers in the smaller cities, are holding a hard and fast line for prohibition.

From the first beginnings of the fight against the liquor traffic in the United States, his statement says, the weekly newspapers have been advocates of restriction local option, state option and national prohibition, successively, moving as fast the public opinion in their communities advanced, and, in fact, often creating public opinion and crystallizing it against the liquor traffic and its attendant evils.

With very few exceptions, he finds, this early attitude on the part of rural editors has continued until the present day. Recently, it is learned, there have been efforts on the part of foes of prohibition of ample wealth to buy up, wholly or in part, rural newspaper properties all over the United States. A number of rural editors have sensed what was going on, and have revealed the plans to the liquor proponents. As a general rule the tenders of the purchasers have been refused.

"In my opinion," Dr. Cherrington says, "the rural press will hold the line against any attempts at subsidizing or purchasing newspapers for wet propaganda purposes, and will stand firm for prohibition and its enforcement."

"The influence of some 15,000 rural newspaper editors is an influence which the wets covet earnestly, but which they are not likely to be able to get," for the overwhelming majority of rural editors are dry.

INJURIES FATAL TO HOMER C. CARNES

(Terre Haute Star, Feb. 8)
Homer C. Carnes, 35 years old, a former Spencerville boy, of 639 Barbour avenue, for the past 12 years a salesman in the insurance department of the Terre Haute Trust Company, died at the Union Hospital Saturday evening from complications growing out of a serious injury he received on January 27 in an automobile accident at Second and Osborne streets.

He sustained a broken neck in the crash and was recovering from the injury when septikemia, which eventually caused his death, set in.

He is survived by the widow, Irene; three daughters, Virginia, Ruth and Barbara; the parents, Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Carnes of Niles, Mich.; two sisters, Mrs. Harold Blackmun and Mrs. Josephine Shuff, also of Niles, and one brother, Ed Carnes, of Des Moines, Iowa.

Carnes attended Indiana University, where he was a member of the Alpha Tau Omega Fraternity, and saw active service during the World War. He was a sergeant major in the infantry, in charge of the debarkation point at Bordeaux, France, and was one of the last group of American soldiers to leave there.

He became connected with the Terre Haute Trust Company in 1919 and during his 12 years service there gained a national reputation as a salesman.

He was a member of the Terre Haute Lodge No. 19, F. and A. M., and of the Fort Harrison Post of the American Legion.

He had been superintendent of the Sunday School at the Centenary Methodist Church for some time and was otherwise active in the affairs of the church. He also was an ardent worker in the Boy Scout movement, both in the church and in the city.

The parents have the sympathy of their many friends in this vicinity.

numbers were good and enjoyed by all listeners.

The president of the Culture Club, Mrs. Mayola Kinsey, then welcomed the guests and conveyed to them the pleasure the Culture Club was experiencing in this social contact and commended the Ladies Literary Club for establishing the precedent. She also elicited benefits and broadening effects that kindly contacts would bring not only to both clubs but would reach out and improve the spirit of the whole community. In closing Mrs. Kinsey quoted the well known little song:

The more we meet together,
The more we meet together,
The happier we'll be.

For your friends are my friends
And my friends are your friends
The more we meet together,
The happier we'll be.

A neat response from the Ladies Literary Club was given by the president, Mrs. Lora Leighty. She told of the anticipation of this evening by the ladies of her club and their pleasure in the realization. All she could say was deeply echoed in the silent approval of the visitors, and more for words alone cannot express the deep felt thanks that the members of the Literary Club want to extend to their hostesses.

The committee for the evening's program was fortunate in securing Mrs. Emily White Hull, of Hicksville, Ohio, to entertain for a period of about forty minutes.

Mrs. Hull is a talented artist and has received special training in the Columbia College of Expression in Chicago, the Emerson School of Oratory in Boston and the Chicago Musical College under Herman DeVries and Wm. Castle.

In accordance with Mrs. Hull's request she appeared without introduction and in a charming way opened her program with a musical reading. She was accompanied at the piano by Mrs. Hazel Greer, also of Hicksville.

Mrs. Hull's repertoire included various types of readings, musical and otherwise, and a group of classical songs.

One of the outstanding numbers on her program was Oscar Wilde's "The Selfish Giant." The feeling and technique with which this number was presented is possible only by years of study and natural ability. A twenty minute cutting from a play was also given and this was made interesting by rich comedy. A tribute to George Washington was paid in a patriotic number.

Each number was prefaced with a few words of explanation given in that charmingly personal way which completely won for her the good will of her entire audience of forty-five ladies. The only criticism heard was that the program ended too soon.

All of the ladies were then invited to the second floor where they were entertained with a game of fortunes.

Meantime the first floor rooms were converted into a banquet hall. The dining room table and small tables were set with complete service and small Valentines were used as place cards. The ladies were invited to come down stairs and were seated at the tables after considerable hunting for their names.

Near each place card was a small scroll tied with the purple and gold of the Culture Club. Each lady was asked to unroll her scroll and found songs which they were asked to sing together. All complied with gusto and music fairly shook the walls.

The first course was served consisting of hot rolls, jellied veal, scalloped potatoes, pickles, and cranberry mold salad on lettuce. The red and green salad was a compliment to the red and green colors of the Literary Club.

The ladies were again asked to sing and this was followed by the last course which was pineapple dessert, topped with whipped cream and red and green candied cherries, white cake, coffee and mints. The mints were green and were served in small, red satin, heart-shaped boxes and these were retained as favors.

Before departing to their various homes there were many expressions of appreciation for a pleasant evening and a general agreement of both clubs that "the more we meet together the happier we'll be."

A CHERRY PUDDING FOR FEBRUARY 22

"I cannot tell a lie—I did it with my little hatchet!" Those immortal words inspire thoughts of that cherry tree young George Washington cut down in its pride, and likewise inspire delicious Cherry Pudding. George may not have relished this reminder of his early folly, but the guests will find it good:

Cherry Pudding
2 tbsps. cooking oil, ¼ cup sugar, ½ cup dark corn syrup, 2 egg yolks, 1 cup canned cherries, ½ tsp. salt, 1½ cups flour, 1½ tps. baking powder, ½ tsp. lemon extract, 2 egg whites, ¾ cup cherry juice.

Beat egg yolks well with one half the sugar. Blend oil with remainder of sugar and combine. Sift dry ingredients and add alternately with the cherry juice. Boil the syrup until it spins a thread and pour over the stiffly beaten egg whites. Fold this into cake mixture. Put oiled paper in the bottom of pan, pour in the cake batter and scatter cup of cherries over the top. Bake at once in moderate oven for one hour (350 degrees F.).

Thelma Curie will present two plays Friday evening, February 21 at the Community Gym. The first "Mummy Liza Interferes," playing the four characters herself and the parts in "The School Clown" are as follows:

Percy ..... Ruth Curie
George ..... Donna Brodbeck
Glady ..... Margaret Brodbeck
Phyllis ..... Evelyn Shook
Johnny ..... Kent Curie
Oliver ..... Catherine Belle Curie
Alice Marie ..... Helen Faye Curie
Narcissus ..... Jean Ridgway
Mrs. Mapleton ..... Janice Ridgway
Miss Stone ..... Thelma Curie

The music will be furnished by Donald Kinsey's Orchestra. The admission is free and the public is cordially invited.

Program will begin at 7:45.

THE P. T. A. PROGRAM DREW A LARGE CROWD

A large crowd attended the P. T. A. meeting last Thursday night and included in the crowd were several Spencerville school patrons.

The first number on the program was given by the Rhythm Band from the Primary room. The teacher, Martha Miser, played "Rustic Dance" on the piano while the band of Kiddies beat time on drums, cymbals, tambourines, etc. The little drum major, young Mr. Ridlan, waved his baton with quite a professional air. Their next number was The Soldiers March and so pleased the audience that they were clapped back for an encore. The drum major announced they knew their stuff so well they could do it backwards. They proceeded to do so by turning their backs to the crowd. The little folks made a fine appearance in their uniforms of red. In honor of Washington the sixth and seventh grades gave a patriotic dialog and Jean Ridgway gave a short reading.

After a brief interlude Mr. Carl Stallman, County Supt. of Schools, announced a debate would be given between St. Joe and Spencerville High Schools on the subject,

"Resolved that Capital Punishment should be Abolished in the United States." Mr. Stallman congratulated the two debating teams on their attempt to foster clear thinking allied with public speaking. The St. Joe debaters had the affirmative side of the question and Spencerville the negative.

Margaret Hamilton, DuWayne Kinsey and Basil Sheffer represented St. Joe High School and Victor McCrory, Mary Wade and Esther Lake debated for Spencerville.

The young people all gave their work in a creditable manner and if they continue with debating they will receive a great deal of personal benefit and provide good entertainment for their schools and patrons.

The judges were B. L. Bailey, I. Cosper and Rev. Kelley, all of Auburn. Two of the judges graded in favor of the affirmative and one judge was for the negative.

IS LEAVING FARM
THIS WEEK
Mr. and Mrs. Harry Waltz will move Saturday from their farm home east of Coburntown Church, to Hicksville, Ohio. It is understood that Mr. Waltz will work out of Auburn. Claude Mason and family of the Curie farm, south of St. Joe, has rented the Waltz farm.

VIGILANTES ARE RE-ORGANIZING IN COUNTY

With the changing of the office of sheriff, the vigilante committee in each town of the county, necessarily needs changing or re-instating. A meeting was held with Sheriff Hoff at Auburn Monday evening and the following people were selected and sworn into office as deputy sheriffs: St. Joe—C. W. Hanna, Wilbur Yeiser and F. R. Bowman. Spencerville—Walter Baker, Beeks Erick and Walter Tyndall.

TWO FIRE CALLS OVER THE WEEK END
A fire call was sent in Saturday night stating that the S. A. Mumaw farm home was on fire, but it was the chimney burning out. When the fire company arrived Mr. Mumaw was out watching to see that nothing serious happened.

Sunday morning the Craig Sheffer home caught fire, by sparks from the chimney igniting a shingle roof. A place of several feet square was burned off by the time the department arrived.

JESUS BEARING THE GOOD TIDINGS

LESSON TEXT—Luke 8:1-40.
GOLDEN TEXT—And it came to pass afterward, that he went throughout every city and village, preaching and showing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God; and the twelve were with him.
PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Teaching About God.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Teaching About God.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Take Heed How Ye Hear.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Cultivate an Honest and Good Heart.

I. The Field of Jesus' Ministry (v. 1).
"He went throughout every city and village." It is the will of God that the gospel should be preached to the whole world.

II. The Message of Jesus (v. 1).
The gospel message is truly good tidings, for God the Great King is offering to rebellious sinners salvation through Jesus Christ.

III. Jesus' Helpers (v. 1).
The twelve apostles were with him. The gospel preacher should utilize the help of others. Those who have heard the good tidings of the gospel gladly join in preaching it to others.

IV. Jesus Supported by Saved Women (vv. 2, 3).
Certain women who had been saved from Satan's power, out of hearts of gratitude looked after the comfort of the Lord and his disciples. This throws light on how Christ and the apostles were supported.

V. Jesus Teaching (vv. 4-21).
Jesus was not only a gospel preacher but a great teacher. When the people from every city gathered unto Him, He taught them.

1. By the Parable of the Sower (vv. 4-15). (1) The sower was Jesus himself (Matt. 13:37). (2) The seed was the Word of God (v. 11). (3) The kinds of ground (vv. 5-15).

The kinds of ground show the condition of the human heart as the Word of God is preached.

a. The wayside (v. 5). The foot-trodden path of the wayside pictures the hard-hearted hearers upon which no impression can be made. The word preached finds no entrance and Satan snatches it away as the birds pick up the grain from the hard-beaten path.

b. Stony ground (v. 6). This is not the earth, but a thin layer of earth in a ledge of rock. This pictures the hearer who receives the gospel with joy, but when persecutions and trials come, he gives up and deserts the company (v. 15).

c. Thorny ground (v. 7). The ground here is good, but it has thorns growing in it. This pictures those whose lives are fruitless because of being preoccupied with earthly cares, riches, and the pleasures of life (v. 14).

d. The good ground (v. 8). The seed here sprang up and bore fruit to the full measure. This is a picture of the honest heart which receives the gospel message and allows it to produce in its life a full harvest of grain (v. 15).

2. By the lighted candle (vv. 16-18). The Word of God is compared to a lamp or lighted candle. A lamp is of use only as it sends out light. One who hears God's Word and does not witness for Christ is as a lamp covered up.

3. Kindship with Jesus Christ (vv. 19, 20). Only those who receive the message of God's Word and render glad obedience to it can claim relationship with Christ.

VI. Jesus Performing Wonders (vv. 22-40).
1. Calming the storm (vv. 22-25). Jesus fell asleep while the disciples were sailing the ship. They were overtaken by an unusual storm and were frightened. In response to their cry of distress Jesus arose and rebuked the storm, and likewise the disciples.

2. Casting out demons (vv. 26-28). When Jesus came into the country of the Gadarenes he was met by a demon-possessed man. Knowing their doom, the demons requested permission to enter a herd of swine. Jesus granted their request, after which the herd ran violently down a steep place into the lake. The effect upon the people was such that they besought Jesus to depart from them. The salvation of this man from demon possession ought to have awakened gratitude on the part of the people. The delivered man desired to be with the Lord. His request was refused because it was more important for him to make known to his friends at home the great deliverance which had come to him.

3. Only One Deliverer.
No one into whose soul the iron of sin's bondage has entered can free either himself or others. Our emancipator must be one who is in fullest, uninterrupted communion with the Father, and comes armed with his power, to break every yoke and bring liberty to the captive.—Alexander MacLaren.

God Weighs Men.
God is not counting men these days; He is weighing them.—Joseph Parker.

NO MATTER HOW HARD I SCRUB, I CAN'T GET THE CLOTHES WHITE ENOUGH

Don't be a washboard slave

Soak your clothes whiter

"HOW hard washday used to be! I'd scrub until my back almost broke, but my wash never looked white enough. Now I just soak the clothes in Rinsosuds, and they come snowy! I don't even boil."

Colored clothes brighter

Trust your finest cottons and linens to Rinsos's safe suds. It keeps them bright and new-looking after dozens of washings. Such creamy, lathering suds—even in hardest water! Twice as much, cup for cup, as light, puffed-up soaps. The makers of 40 leading washers recommend Rinsos. Great for dishwashing! Get the BIG package.

MILLIONS USE RINSO in tub, washer and dishpan

Mothers... Watch Children's COLDS

COMMON colds often "settle" in throat and chest where they may become dangerous. Don't take a chance—at the first sniffle rub on Children's Musterole once every hour for five hours.

Children's Musterole is just good old Musterole, you have known so long, in milder form.

This famous blend of oil of mustard, camphor, menthol and other ingredients brings relief naturally. Musterole acts as a "counter-irritant"—not just a salve—it penetrates and stimulates blood circulation, helps to draw out infection and pain.

Keep full strength Musterole on hand, for adults and the milder—Children's Musterole for little tots. All druggists.

THE STORY

Returning to London, practically penniless, after an unsuccessful business trip, Sir George Sanderson takes dinner with his widowed stepmother, his old nurse, "Aggy." He did not approve of her marriage to his father, but her explanation satisfied him. Little is left of the estate, and Lady Sanderson proposes that they go to the United States to visit her brother, Robert MacBeth, wealthy contractor. Sir George agrees. MacBeth lives on an island estate with his daughter, Roberta, who longs for city life. MacBeth is a victim of arthritis and almost helpless. MacBeth is glad to see his sister and asks the two to stay. Roberta is keeping a date with Jack Navarro, about whom she knows little. MacBeth arranges for his sister to take charge of the household and George to act as secretary. Roberta does not approve of the arrangement. She tells her father she is not interested in George, while the young man takes an air of indifference to her. MacBeth tells George about trouble he has had with the pay roll and arranges for Roberta to introduce George at the bank and later take the money to the workmen.

Roberta arrived at her father's chair and listened impatiently to his proposal, her eyes blazing with indignation. "Why can't some one else take him down to the village? I don't like him. I think he's the most disagreeable young man I ever knew and I simply don't see why August can't drive him."

He looked at her a little sadly: "Surely, Roberta, even the most modern of daughters would not think it extraordinary if her father, who cannot do it himself, asked her to introduce his secretary at the bank and also take him up the river to show him the 'windmill' job."

"It isn't that," Roberta said sullenly, not a little ashamed of herself. "Then what is it?" her father asked, and there was a tired note in his voice as well as exasperation.

"I have an engagement for today."

"That's too bad. I'm afraid I'll have to ask you to cancel it. What I ask won't wait. It's business."

"I can't," Roberta began and then stopped. "I don't want to cancel it. Father. Can't we manage it some other way? I could get one of the boys down at Green Bend to take him."

He hesitated and then decided to trust her. "There's been a little difficulty about the payroll in the city, and I'm not going to risk any outside knowledge of how much money I have here or what I am asking Sir George to do for me."

Roberta stiffened. "You mean you won't let me off?"

Her father shook his head wearily: "I have explained why."

"No, I don't think you have. You've just given me an order and apparently business comes before anything else."

"It does just now," MacBeth said slowly. "I wish you could see it as I do, Bobbie. The money isn't just money and the loss of it wouldn't be just the money loss. I have insured the payroll. It's a matter of keeping faith with the men. The money means home and food and clothing for all these men and they depend on me to deliver it to them on the day I've promised it. I can remember when you were a baby, Bobbie, how I might have to come to it some day and soon, but not now."

She lifted her eyes and saw the blue car still stationary. She raised her arm and waved twice over her head, the signal they had both agreed upon as "Wait for me," and then turned to her father. "I'll be there," she said, and then she broke the engagement then. But I shan't forget, Father. You owe me something for this."

She was gone before Robert MacBeth could say anything, and the next minute was running down the beach to the bridge. "I'll be there," she said, and then she broke the engagement then. But I shan't forget, Father. You owe me something for this."

By the blue car a very angry young man stood waiting.

"Well," he snapped, "what do you want me to wait for? Isn't it enough that I'm caught like this here?"

"I can't help it, Jack," Roberta said breathlessly. "It's all off for today. Father wants me to take his secretary to the bank." She blurted it out before she remembered that her father especially wanted no one to know. Oh, well, Jack didn't count! It would tell him nothing, anyway.

But it did interest Jack. He stopped his tinkering and fussing and looked at her.

"What bank and why do you have to take him?"

"It's the village bank, and I don't know why except—oh, yes, I do! Father wants them to know him so that he can cash checks and so forth."

"Hum!" Jack regarded her slyly. "Well, if not today, let's make it tomorrow."

Roberta regarded him with troubled eyes. She shook her head. "Tomorrow he wants me to take him up the river to the windmill construction camp."

Jack looked at her narrowly. "You mean you want to take him?"

Roberta shook her head. "Not much. I can think of lots of pleasant ways of spending my time than taking that English beanpole about."

Roberta looked at him and her face changed. She was sure she had found the solution.

"Jack, I have it! You come with us up the river tomorrow. It wouldn't be nearly so stupid if you were along."

"What?" Slowly Jack brought his attention back to her and looked at her with amusement, tinged with sus-

"I Don't Choose to Play Second Fiddle to Sir George."

picion. "Great idea that is, I must say. Can't be done. I don't choose to play second fiddle to Sir George."

"Who told you his name was Sir George?"

"You did."

Roberta shook her head. "Of course you did. You told me that day we lunched at Lady Louisa's."

He had overheard himself and Roberta let him see that he had. "I couldn't. I didn't know he was coming or anything about him then."

"Well, then, you said something about him this morning."

Roberta looked extremely skeptical and opened her mouth to protest when Jack dropped his pliers.

"Oh, d—n, I jammed my finger! See here," he turned on her holding his finger in his handkerchief. "What difference does it make that you have forgotten you told me his name, when I say you did? Are we going to argue all morning about that? I have got to go to work, and he stooped and smiled at her, "unless you want to come with me and convince me I am wrong."

Roberta shook her head, but she was puzzled. She did not like Jack's way of saying things today.

"Well, then I'll just start the old bus, and see you again. When?"

"I don't know," said Roberta. Then, suddenly, as she looked at him directly, "Jack, why not come to the house? It would make it lots easier for me and we could see each other often, if you'd just come along and be pleasant to father."

"No," Jack answered, so promptly that it was like an explosion of wrath. Then he looked at Roberta and smiled, showing his perfect teeth. "I don't mind the old man, Bobbie, but I can't stand watching that Englishman hanging around, blissing your father and trying to get at you. When will he go?"

"I don't know," Roberta was disturbed.

"Meet me Friday, same place, and we'll plan things out."

"If I can."

"Oh, you'll be there—if you really care," and Jack was gone.

Roberta stared forlornly after him.

Unique Church Used by Benedictines as Shrine

When one thinks of a famous church one naturally thinks of one great in age, great in architecture or great in its historic associations. One finds none of these characteristics in the little church on the Kentucky side of the Ohio river, and so, perhaps, one can hardly refer to it in the same manner one refers to Westminster, Cologne, Notre Dame or Santa Sophia. It may not be a famous church, but it is at least unique, for it is the smallest church in the world, capable of accommodating but three or four worshippers, says the Cincinnati Enquirer. The small brick structure was built in 1890 by some brothers of the Benedictine order, who used it as a shrine during the years they were engaged there in the world, capable of accommodating but three or four worshippers, says the Cincinnati Enquirer. The small brick structure was built in 1890 by some brothers of the Benedictine order, who used it as a shrine during the years they were engaged there in the world, capable of accommodating but three or four worshippers, says the Cincinnati Enquirer.

She turned to go toward the house and saw the ill-joy, as she mentally called Sir George, come along the towpath.

He still looked puzzled, but when he looked into Roberta's hostile eyes, he saw there was no prospect of help in that quarter.

How could he go to this girl, who disliked him enough as it was, and question her about her recent companion because the man looked like a type of hound he had frequently seen on his way to and from Yucatan?

CHAPTER V

But could he speak to the girl's father, or even to the girl herself, on the strength of a likeness, and that not very strong? He could not even remember the man's name!

When he came within hailing distance Roberta spoke: "Are you ready to go to the village with me to meet the bank manager?"

"Absolutely. Now?"

"Immediately after luncheon. On the way back we'll stop at Green Bend for tea. Father says now that you're fairly well acquainted in the city—he wants you to meet everybody here. We will probably give a dinner and dance this week for Aunt Aggy—and for you. I'll have to consult her as to the night."

"Awfully good of you," Sir George said mechanically, wishing that he might ask her a question or two about the lad in the blue car.

As though answering his thought, she continued with a disdainful grimace. "Entertaining here's the last scream in old-fashioned stuff. It will be a mixture of old and young."

"Is the man I saw this morning one of the young?"

Roberta stopped short, flushed and answered him slowly: "No, he doesn't belong about here."

"Sorry. His face interested me."

"Oh, you will probably see him again," answered Roberta lightly, but though Sir George nodded, he noticed she did not give him the man's name, and she had not made the slightest effort to introduce him this morning.

They sat around a table in a cheap Philadelphia restaurant, and they might have been, such is the uniformity of men today in their custom-made and fashioned clothing, anything but honest clerks at luncheon. In clothes, manners and language they resembled some of the crude but fairly straight business men of that district.

Their business, if neither legitimate nor honest, was profitable.

The oldest man, gray haired, with thin lips, was the head of the business. He had thought it out carefully during three years of imprisonment at Sing Sing and he had carried out his associates with care. It had been a profitable and exciting partnership, although the office in this backwater street seemed dull and respectable enough.

The name on the door was, "The Elite Social Register, Inc." and the office, two in number, were duly supplied with files and card indexes. If the police ever grew suspicious what was there to dread? All they would find was a quiet office run by one man, a stenographer and filing clerk. If they should by chance find the leader there, why here was a crook who was tired of the game and had settled down to earning an honest living, leaving a little blue book that told society climbers who was who, in that world of millionaires which constitutes America's aristocracy of money.

The youngest man present was Jack Navarro who was talking volubly. While the others listened to him with attention, it could not be said that they listened with patience.

"You bring too little," the leader interrupted. "You say there is money in the country bank, but how much? You say this Englishman is about to be trusted by his employer—but how far?"

Jack shrugged his shoulders. "I bring you what I can get," he told them sulkily. "I ask too many questions, the girl may grow suspicious."

"Of what? Why should a rich kid like her have any suspicions? Have you been talking?"

"If I say too much," Jack snarled, "she will be suspicious that I am after her money. Even now there is trouble. She asks me to go to their house so that I meet the father. Well, I cannot go."

"Why not?"

"Because of that cursed Englishman."

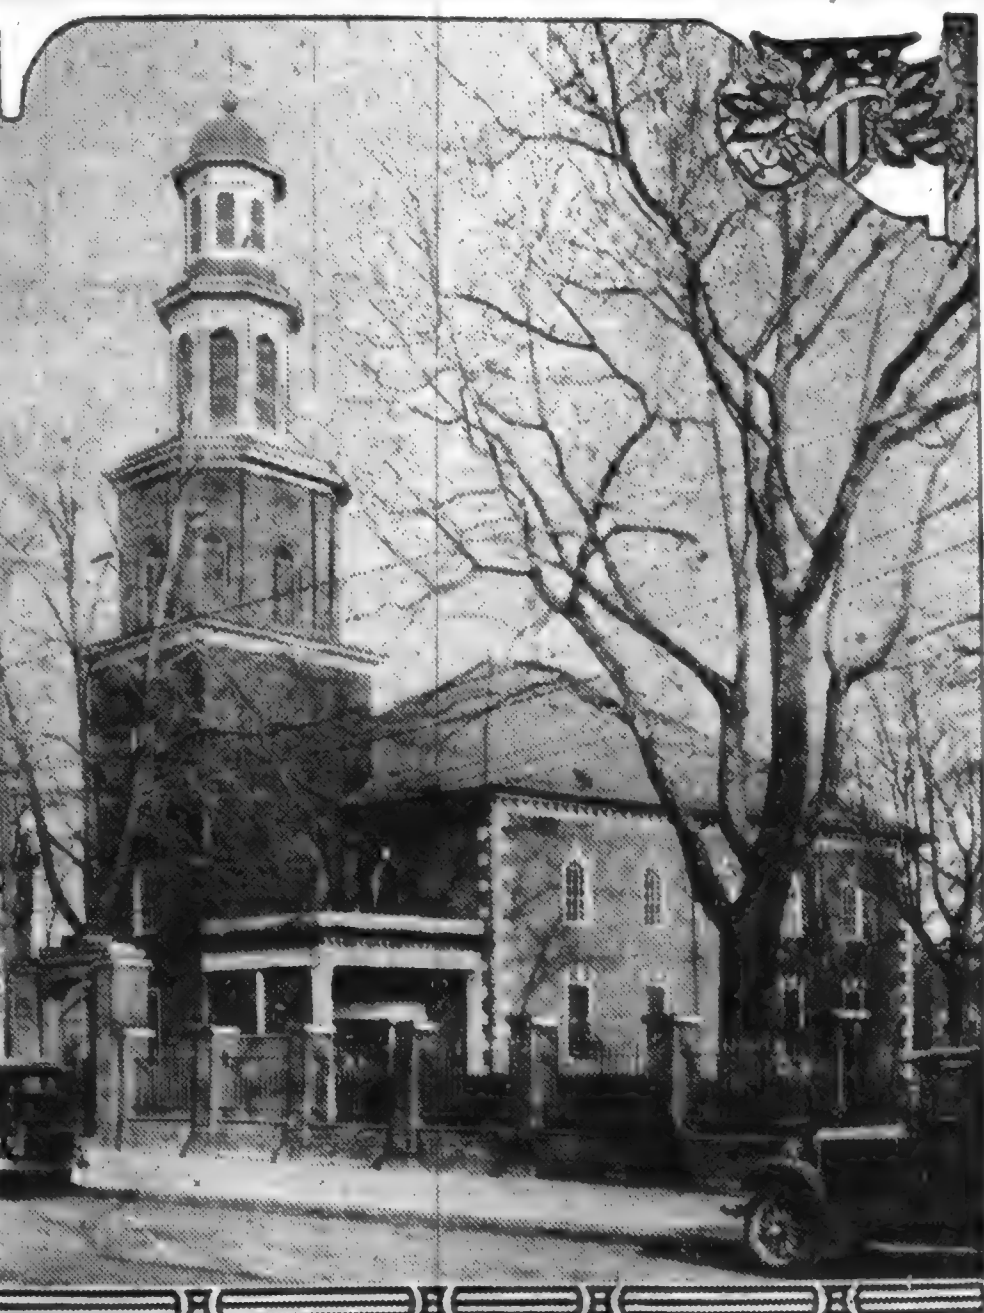

"He knows you?"

"On the steamer—we met."

The older man looked from one to the other of his companions without speaking. Finally he came to Jack.

CHRIST CHURCH, ALEXANDRIA, VA.

Two momentous decisions were witnessed, at wide intervals, in the shadow of Christ Episcopal church. In the summer of 1774, Washington, surrounded by friends standing in the church doorway, advised renunciation of George III and declared he would fight for the independence of America. On the same spot 97 years later when intimation was made that he would ultimately command the Confederate armies, Robert E. Lee knelt in prayer with heavy heart loyally determined to follow the fortunes of his beloved Virginia.

The Washington pew may still be seen in this historic edifice.

Women Saved Mount Vernon for Country

The nation is indebted to a group of patriotic women who restored Mount Vernon, the home of George Washington, to its original beauty and dignity. The organization, which by its devotion and spirit has been able to accomplish this, is known as the Mount Vernon Ladies' association. It holds its annual council session on the estate.

Back in the fifties the last of the Washington family to possess Mount Vernon, exhausted by the effort not only to keep up the estate, but to endure the strain of entertaining a constant stream of visitors who wished to see the home of their first President, offered it for sale to the state of Virginia and the United States government.

When neither of these public agencies took advantage of the offer Miss Ann Pamela Cunningham appealed to the women of the country to save the home where George Washington found his greatest happiness.

Raise $200,000 Fund.

By her untiring efforts and with the help of Edward Everett and other enthusiastic workers, $200,000 was raised for the purchase of Mount Vernon. Under the charter from the state of Virginia by which the Mount Vernon Ladies' association holds the property, their proprietorship lasts as long as it is fittingly maintained.

It is the purpose of the ladies of this organization to make Mount Vernon exactly as it was in the time of its famous proprietor. To accomplish this they spare no thought, effort or money. There are never extravagant, but they always require that the very best in equipment or service be employed.

Ever-Blooming Flowers.

In the flower beds, outlined by box hedges, are always blooming, from the gayest tulips to the early spring to the equally striking dahlias of fall. Cuttings of box and ivy and seedlings are on sale in order that all who wish may have some growings thing from Mount Vernon in their own gardens.

A great many of the original furnishings of the mansion have been found by these zealous women, and have been placed in their proper setting. Although some furniture which did not belong to George and Martha Washington is used to add to the homelike atmosphere, articles which have not been authenticated as original after careful investigation are no longer accepted or purchased.

It is no effort to imagine the enjoyment that the gracious master and mistress of Mt. Vernon derived from their home. By merely removing the grille at doorways, perfectly appointed mansion is again ready for occupancy. Every detail is complete. Beds are made with snowy covers over billowy mattresses, books are on the library shelves, a card table and counters await players, piano and flute are there, even knives are in the family dining room, and a clock ticks on the mantel in the banquet hall.

In addition to the ancient, rare and valuable furnishings are the most modern protective systems, by their perfect concealment lending no discordant note. Hot-air heat is piped from a distant furnace, portable electric fixtures are used when necessary, and equipment for fire prevention that is the last word in ingenuity is used.

Danger of Fire Minimized.

Fire is the dread specter of Mount Vernon. Every known precaution against it is employed. Guards, expert by training, fly to their posts at a second's notice, and chemicals and water are available for immediate use. Even a mechanical fire detector is installed.

The ladies of the association, which has made Mount Vernon both what it is today and was in George Washington's time, by their monumental work earn for themselves a reward which in turn inspires them with love of and devotion to their mission.

Each State Has Member.

Each state is entitled to one member in this body. She is known as a vice-regent. Usually there are about thirty-five vice-regents, for as vacancies occur much time, and consideration is given to the election of a new member, who receives the honor for life.

She must be a woman who will be in harmony with the ideals of the organization and imbued with the traditions of Mount Vernon, and who, like her associates, will possess the proper esteem for her privileged position and show her devotion to the accomplishment of her duties.

The work of the regent and vice-regents does not end with council session. During the year they distribute literature on Mount Vernon, speak to schools and organizations on the subject, and in every way spread the ennobling traditions of the home of America.—Frederic J. Hankin, in Chicago Daily News.

Wrong Description Little Geraldine's aunt had come to visit her and she was talking to Geraldine and her mother about her father, whom she never had met. Later, just as she was preparing to leave, the aunt mentioned that she had seen a little girl that looked like Geraldine with a gentleman downtown, the Sunday before.

"Well," said Geraldine, "it couldn't have been me. I was downtown, all right, but I was with my daddy all day."

Love in Rough Marriages among the Formosan aborigines are arranged by force. When a young man loves a girl, his friends call a conference, says an article in the Japan Advertiser. They imprison the youth, kidnap the girl and bring her to her wooer. After the kidnapping they start negotiations with the girl's parents for the union. In case the proposal is rejected the men turn both the youth and girl out of their circles.

NOTICE TO CONTRACTORS OF THE CONSTRUCTION OF A CONCRETE HIGHWAY

State of Indiana,
County of DeKalb, ss:
In the Commissioners Court DeKalb County, Indiana.

In the Matter of the St. Joe and Spencerville Highway in DeKalb County, Indiana.

Notice is hereby given that the Board of Commissioners of DeKalb County, Indiana, will up to the hour of 10:00 o'clock A. M. on the 3rd day of March, 1931, at the Commissioners Court Room in the court house in the City of Auburn, receive sealed proposals for the improvement of a highway in said county which said improvement is known by and designated as the the said plans and specifications and profiles aforesaid.

That the estimated cost of the said improvement is the sum of One Hundred Thirty-Five Thousand ($135,000.00) Dollars and Sixteen Cents ($135.16).

That the length of said highway to be improved is about (5.2) miles and is described as follows: beginning at a point on what is known as the H. M. Widney et al improved gravel road; said point being approximately 1800 feet north of the south-east corner of Section 15, Concord Township, DeKalb County, Indiana, and runs from thence as follows: West to First Street in the Town of St. Joe; thence South on First Street to Washington Street; thence West on Washington Street to the Section line road; thence South and South-west on the section line road on what is commonly called the St. Joe, Spencerville Road to the village of Spencerville, Indiana, thence South and South-west through Spencerville on what is known as the Spencerville, Leo Road; ending at a point on the DeKalb-Allen County Line; said point being approximately 900 feet East of the South-West corner of Section 32, Spencer Township, DeKalb County, Indiana.

Each bidder must submit with his proposal a bond with sufficient surety, payable to the State of Indiana, in the penal sum, double the amount of his proposal, conditioned for the performance of the work on which he bids. If personal sureties are given, they shall be residents and free holders of the State of Indiana. Each bidder must submit with his proposal an affidavit to the effect that he has not entered into any combination or collusion or agreement with any person relative to the price to be bid by any one; that he has done nothing to prevent anyone from bidding; that his bid is made without reference to any other person.

Said improvement will be let as a whole to the lowest responsible bidder duly qualifying as such. The Board reserves the right to reject any and all bids. The work shall be completed within a time to be fixed by agreement between the Board of County Commissioners and the successful bidder.

Witness my hand and seal this 4th day of February, 1931.

SPENCERVILLE

Mrs. Mary Reed and children were Sunday guests of the Wm. Reed home.

Howard Beams had a collision with a telephone pole at Newville, Monday evening enroute home from Hicksville. The snow blinded him.

News was received here Saturday of the serious illness of Mrs. Gladys Osborne of Andrews. Her brothers, Gerry and Clarence Gloyd left for her bedside at once. Later reports are that she is some improved.

The Friendly Bible class met at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Harold Kraft on Thursday evening. There were 33 members present. Paul Dean was the winner of a contest. A delicious lunch and good time enjoyed.

Mrs. Golden High is not feeling very well at this time, while not bedfast she is not able to be out much. She is spending her time compiling her Edgar Guest scrap book which will contain hundreds of the very choicest poems from the pen of this famous author. When she completes her work she will have a most valued volume.

The stock and grain barn on the Arthur Furnish farm is about completed, with the exception of some inside work. The basement is for stock while the upper floor will be used for grain and hay. The barn was built on the hill east of the Furnish home and on the old McNall farm. Charles and Harold did practically all the labor.

Harold Bowser, of near Fort Wayne was a Monday guest at the R. U. Bowser home.

Chas. High has been out of his restaurant for the past month, being on the sick list. Fred is taking care of the business.

Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Whitacre, of Shelbyville were week-end guests of the R. U. Bowser family. Mrs. Whitacre remained for the week to visit among friends.

Mrs. Ethel Bowser very pleasantly entertained the Cheerful Workers class and their teacher, Mrs. Princess Reitenwall at her home on Thursday afternoon.

The Young Ladies Social Club met on Wednesday evening with Miss Bina Zimmerman. Those winning prizes were Mrs. Ellen Hart, Mrs. Gaylon Tustison, Mrs. LaVern Koch and Mrs. Zelpha Steward.

The Home Bureau Club met on Wednesday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Lizzie Hart. One guest was present Mrs. Anna Boger. A report of the recent short course at Purdue was given by Miss Lizzie Hart, Mrs. Ora Wilmot and Mrs. Claudia Hafner. Mrs. Hazel Washler was elected vice president after the resignation of the former vice president, Mrs. Claude Laub.

Upon the application of the heirs, W. G. Erick of Spencerville has been appointed in DeKalb circuit court as administrator of the estate of the late Isaiah Smith, who died at Spencerville February 2. There is $8,000 in personal property and $15,000 in real estate. The heirs are the widow, Delilah Smith, four children, Samuel, Emery and Warren

Mr. and Mrs. James Wyatt of Auburn were Sunday afternoon callers at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ira Bone.

UNEMPLOYMENT RETURNS BY CLASSES AND SEX

The Director of the Census announced today the unemployment returns for Indianapolis, Ind., by classes and sex. The unemployment inquiry, which was made last April as a part of the population census, covered all persons usually working at a gainful occupation who were not at work on the day preceding the enumerator's call. These returns are presented in seven classes, based on the worker's status, such as "out of a job," "having a job, but on lay-off," "unable to work," etc.

The most significant group, designated in the tables of Class A, is made up of persons out of a job, able to work and looking for a job. These persons numbered 10,080, forming 2.8 per cent of the total population. The total included 8,307 males and 1,773 females.

The next most important group, designated Class B, comprises persons having jobs who are on lay-off without pay, excluding those sick or voluntarily idle. In this class there are 2,530 persons, 2,060 males and 470 females.

The remaining returns were grouped into five classes, as follows: Class C, persons out of a job and unable to work, 874; Class D, persons having jobs but idle on account of sickness or disability, 1,285; Class E, persons out of a job and not looking for work, 326; Class F, persons having jobs but Class G, persons having jobs and drawing pay, though not at work (on vacation, etc.), 310.

Class G, persons having jobs and drawing pay, though not at work (on vacation, etc.), 310.

The following table summarizes the returns for Indianapolis by classes and sex. These figures are taken from the final tabulation sheets, but are still subject to possible correction.

Total population 364,161; male, 180,620; female, 183,541.

Class A. Persons out of a job, able to work, and looking for a job, 10,080; male, 8,307; female, 1,773. Per cent of population, total 2.8; male, 4.6; female, 1.0.

Class B. Persons having jobs but on lay-off without pay, excluding those sick or voluntarily idle, total, 2,530; male, 2,060; female, 470. Per cent of population, total, 0.7; male, 1.1; female, 0.3.

Class C. Persons out of a job and unable to work, total, 874; male, 671; female, 203.

Class D. Persons having jobs but idle on account of sickness or disability, total, 1,285; male, 842; female, 443.

Class E. Persons out of a job and not looking for work, total, 323; male, 198; female, 125.

Class F. Persons having jobs but voluntarily idle, without pay, total, 326; male, 213; female, 113.

Class G. Persons having jobs and drawing pay, though not at work (on vacation, etc.) total, 310; male, 196; female, 114.

A BENEFIT DANCE FOR THE RED CROSS

Will be given at the Silver Moon Pavilion, between Auburn and Waterloo, on next Tuesday night, February 24.

Plans are under way to make the dance a big event, and at the same time create a fund for the county's share of the Red Cross relief campaign for $10,000,000.

The usual admission on Tuesday nights is 35 cents for dancing to 12 o'clock, but on next Tuesday the park plan will be used. The gate admission will be 19 cents and each dance 10 cents. All the service clubs, sororities, lodges, and like organizations in the county are urged to help make the dance a big success. To those persons who do not wish to dance, they may attend, hear some good music and watch the dancers for the gate admission of only 10 cents.

Fish and Game Club Information

Building Quail Covers. Although the weather has been extremely mild for a month and there has been no need to care for quail against snow and ice, the game wardens have made preparations against conditions that may come in February and March. Quail shelters and covers have been built in all parts of the state, under instructions from this Division.

Game Warden Service. For January the statistics of the warden service show: arrests, 70; convictions, 58; cases pending, 10; cases dismissed, 2; fines and costs, $1,291.95.

An Important Message to You And Your Loved Ones

WHEN you realize that nearly SIXTY per cent of the expense part of life insurance premiums is used to pay for SELLING the insurance to you—$603,538,769.97 during 1929 alone!—you will instantly grasp the great importance TO YOU of this message.

Time was when life insurance—the safest and best plan for protecting your loved ones—needed to be sold by salesmen.

That time is PAST! Today everyone knows that legal reserve life insurance is an absolute family necessity, and it is now eagerly BOUGHT, rather than sold.

Many thousands of thrifty people the country over are literally flooding the Union Mutual Life with more than sixty millions in applications for its wonderful new policy which you can obtain WITHOUT MEDICAL EXAMINATION—WITHOUT PAYING HIGHER PREMIUMS TO COVER HIGH PERSONAL SELLING COSTS—WITHOUT EXPENSE OF ANY KIND—at the astoundingly low quarterly investment of $4.13 for $1,000.00 of life and $3,000.00 of accident insurance at age 35, with disability benefits and many additional advantages included!—premiums for all other ages from 10 to 60 years being in exact proportion as shown below; and you can get as much as $3,000.00 of life, with $25,000.00 of accident protection at this surprisingly small cost of a few pennies a day which will NEVER INCREASE.

Easily—conveniently—privately—WITHOUT MEDICAL EXAMINATION OR AGENTS TO TAKE UP YOUR TIME—you can now secure one of the finest of all life insurance policies—and as soon as you mail the handy coupon printed below, the policy will come to you for your FREE INSPECTION. Not one cent of expense or obligation.

And when you have seen the policy, you are sure to be as enthusiastic about it as Attorney Henry B. Colburn of Cheyenne, Wyo., who says:

"Your policy and plan is evidence to me of capable, conservative management, of the determination of your Company to render the greatest possible return to your patrons, and of the success of your plan to avoid the expense of medical examination and agency costs."

You owe it to yourself to SEE the policy! It's GUARANTEED to please you—and if it doesn't, for any reason or for NO reason, all you have to do is send the policy back within ten days after you receive it.

Mail the Coupon Today! See for yourself that this is THE policy of ALL policies you should possess! Remember—it will cost you NOTHING if you decide not to keep it!

Sandman Story for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

The school bell had sounded and all the children went to their different classrooms and began their lessons in the big city school where they were students.

They had not been at their lessons long when a great bell sounded through the school.

It was different from the usual school bell which brought them to their lessons, and it filled them all with fear.

The teachers looked frightened, too, but they were all very, very quiet.

"March out, slowly, in single file," said the teacher of each classroom.

They all knew how to do this, too, for they often had a fire drill.

It always made them a little nervous but they knew if they were quiet and didn't get really frightened all would be well.

There was only great danger when people lost their heads, as the saying goes.

It's a wise saying, too—it means that people act as though they hadn't any heads with brains in them at all.

The bell had been a fire bell and every one knew it. Soon every one of the many children were out in the big courtyard and thence to the street.

The teachers were all out, too. All but one and that teacher was the one who helped them with their singing chorus.

They wondered where she could be. They felt sure she must be out somewhere and each class thought she was with another group.

But no one saw her, and every one felt a great fear.

The sound of the motors and engines coming down the street with their sharp, shrill sirens made every one watch the firemen.

They were coming! How quickly they had arrived. They were putting on their long rubber coats and their red helmets as they were jumping off the fire engines.

Some of them had been putting on their coats as the engines had dashed through the streets to the school.

The hoses were put to work. The water began to pour into the windows of the school which were now sending out big columns of smoke.

The fire was a large one and it had started so suddenly—no one knew how.

The firemen were climbing up the ladders. Everything, it seemed, was done in a second.

"Is there anyone in the building?" asked a fireman.

"We can't see Miss Cole, the singing teacher, though she can't possibly still be in the building," they said.

"She has probably gone for lunch. She has her lunch early. She can't possibly still be in the school," said others.

Oldest Trees in Europe

Between Loch Rannoch and Loch Tay is Glen Lyon, the longest glen in Scotland, which stretches its mysterious beauty from Loch Lyon over 30 miles. Many a tourist in Perthshire has rushed past it, little knowing that he was missing a haunt whose loveliness would cheer him long after more notable places had become dim in his mind. The Scots call it "the Dark Crooked Glen of the Great Rocks."

The place is red with history and legend, battles of kirk and crosses which go back to the earliest days of Celtic Christianity. Its yew trees claim to be the oldest authentic specimens of vegetation in Europe.

Cabbage Slaw Makes Delicious Salad

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Cabbage slaw is one of the most popular ways of serving cabbage in place of a salad. It is, in fact, a salad, with a boiled dressing instead of a mayonnaise. The hot dressing is poured over the finely shredded cabbage so that it will have an opportunity to blend its flavor thoroughly with the vegetable. This slaw can be served hot or cold, according to the bureau of home economics, of the United States Department of Agriculture, but most people are accustomed to it as "cold" slaw.

Select a hard head of cabbage, cut in quarters, and wash thoroughly in cold water. Drain, shred, and set aside in a cold place until crisp. Pour hot dressing over the crisp cabbage and stir until well mixed. Serve hot or cold.

One cupful chopped celery, or one-half cupful of finely shredded green pepper, or one cupful of thinly sliced tart apple may be added.

Dressing for Cabbage Slaw.

3 eggs — 1/4 tsp. mustard
1/4 cup water 1/4 tsp. celery seed
1/4 cup vinegar 1/2 tsp. butter or
1/4 cup sugar other fat
1/4 tsp. salt

Beat the eggs, add all the ingredients except the fat, and cook in a double boiler until thickened. Stir constantly and just before removing from the fire add the fat. Pour over the cabbage while hot. If served as cold slaw, chill after the dressing is added.

White Choice for Evening Wear

By CHERRIE NICHOLAS

A distinguishing feature about the majority of lovely gowns which are leading their enchantment to the formal evening picture is their fascinating simplicity. Call it "sophisticated simplicity" if you will, for subjected to critical analysis, these frocks, which are classic in their perfect lines and workmanship, reveal a superb technique which bespeaks none other than a master touch.

When the guileless onlooker fails you that this or that fair one was dressed in "simple white" be not misled. The mind, wise to the ways of evening modes "as is" in our day and generation, know full well that simplicity as applied to dress is, in the modern interpretation of the word, born of that "art which conceals art."

There's the exquisite gown in the picture, for example, the uninitiated may describe it as a simple frock, but to those who know, it is a masterpiece which in the final analysis resolves itself into a matter of white transparent velvet of finest texture together with lovely white flat crepe and bright beaded bands, the entire falling into lines of grace through the subtle art of the designer.

All the way through the program of evening dress the tendency is to call attention to beauty of fabric. The gowns of satin and transparent velvet which are playing such an outstanding role in the formal mode are made to look as classically simple as possible regardless of the fact that in their actual construction they involve a labyrinth of intricate manipulation.

It is interesting and significant to note that in Paris leading couturiers are carrying the vogue of velvet into spring and summer. Which goes to confirm that which has long since been self-evident—that velvet is proving itself a perennial. When we stop to consider that modern velvet weaves are in many instances as exquisitely delicate and sheer as the most fragile chiffon, it is easy to understand why designers have come to regard it as a practical and altogether lovely year-round material.

Bacon and Liver

Cleanse and parboil sliced liver. Cut in strips the size of slices of bacon. Lay a slice of liver on a slice of bacon and roll them together, placing the roll in place with a wooden toothpick. Have ready some bacon fat hot, in a fry pan. Set the rolls on edge—and brown quickly all over. Cover and put in the oven till well done. Serve with hashed, browned potatoes.

BODY REQUIRES PROTEIN DIET

Foods Classified as Sources of Protein.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Protein is necessary in the diet for the growth and repair of body tissues. It may yield energy also, but its important function is for building and upkeep. If the diet does not furnish enough protein, growth is stunted.

Scientists have found, however, that foods classed as proteins are made up of combinations of certain recognized substances called amino-acids and that unless the right combination of these is present the food is an incomplete protein, and unsatisfactory as a body builder, although it may be a useful food from some other standpoint. Among the most popular and readily obtained sources of complete, or "efficient" protein are lean meat of all kinds, poultry, fish, eggs, milk, and cheese. These foods are so commonly used in the American diet that most people get an adequate amount of protein, and need consider chiefly whether or not they are varying their supply sufficiently to avoid monotony.

It used to be thought that various legumes (beans and peas), gelatin, and some other articles of food classed as proteins could take the place of these named above as good sources of body-building material. But it has been found that several of these foods are "incomplete" proteins. To be on the safe side it is well to include in the daily menus such foods as are illustrated in the accompanying picture, taken by the United States Department of Agriculture, all of which are known to supply protein of good quality.

Good Things for the Family Table

By NELLIE MAXWELL

"You have to believe in happiness—it isn't an outward thing. The spring never makes the song, I guess."

As I sang the song the spring-aye, many a heart could find content.

If it saw the joy on the road it went.

The joy ahead when it had to.

For the joy is there—but you have to believe.

Chocolate in various forms has always been a most popular confection, dessert, cake or cake filling. As nearly everybody likes chocolate one may satisfy the taste of any as regards the kind of cake. From loaf to drop cakes, simple or rich, they always find a glad welcome.

Chocolate Caramels.—Put two and one-half tablespoonsful of butter into a saucepan, when melted add two cupsful of molasses, one cupful of brown sugar, and stir until the sugar is dissolved and when the boiling point is reached add three squares of chocolate grated, stirring constantly until the chocolate is melted. Boil until a firm ball is formed when a little is dropped into cold water. Add one teaspoonful of vanilla and turn into a buttered pan to cool.

Chocolate Custard Pie.—Line a pie plate with pastry, flute the rim and fill with the following: Beat the yolks of three eggs slightly, add one-half cupful of sugar and continue beating, add one tablespoonful of soft butter, the same of flour, three-fourths of a cupful of milk and two squares of melted chocolate; flavor with vanilla and bake. Spread with a meringue made of the egg whites and one-half cupful of powdered sugar. Return to the oven and brown.

Chocolate Cup Cakes.—Take one-half cupful of shortening, add one cupful of sugar and cream, add one and one-half cupsful of flour with two and one-half teaspoonsful of baking powder finely sifted alternately with one-half cupful of milk, add two beaten yolks of eggs, three squares of melted chocolate, one-half teaspoonful of salt and one teaspoonful of vanilla, before the milk and flour is added. Fold in at the last the well beaten whites of two eggs. Bake in small gem pans.

Onions Stuffed With Sausage.—Take even sized onions, peel and scoop out a center large enough to take a small sausage, or one may use the bulk sausage for filling. Chop the centers removed, mix with bread crumbs and the sausage, stuff and place in a baking dish. Four around them cream or broth left from any meat. Bake well and often during the baking. At the last heap a spoonful of buttered crumbs on the top of each and brown well before serving. Use as a garnish to pork roast or chops.

Spiced Drinks Popular at Parties

Spiced cider and spiced grape juice are new to many people, and are most acceptable for serving to groups, large or small, meeting in the evening, during the season before ice cold drinks are preferred. They are made as follows, according to the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture:

Spiced Cider.—1 quart sweet cider, 1/4 cup sugar, 1/4 tsp. salt, 1/4 cup whole cloves, 1/4 cup powdered allspice.

Mix all ingredients and bring to the boiling point and let stand for some hours. Reheat and remove the whole spices before serving.

Spiced Grape Juice.—1 quart grape juice, 1/4 cup sugar, 1/4 tsp. salt, 1/4 cup whole cloves, 1/4 cup powdered allspice.

Mix all ingredients and bring to the boiling point. Allow the fruit juice to stand for three or four hours so that the flavor of the spice will be drawn out. When ready to be served reheat and remove the spices. Lemon juice may be added if desired.

Kitchen Utensils Are Kept Near Stove

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

A farm woman in Maine solved the problem of having her saucepans and their lids conveniently near the stove by using the wall space just back of her range. One of the boys of the family who could wield a hammer, saw and paint brush, built a frame on which hooks could be put, as the kitchen walls were made of light wall-board. The rack for the lids is very simple. In a family where the children are being trained to help with the housework, there is a good psychological effect on those who are inclined to be slipshod, in having the bottoms of the pans so plainly exposed to scrutiny. Self-respect demands proper scrubbing before a saucepan is hung up.

The photograph was taken by the United States Department of Agriculture, in connection with a kitchen improvement contest.

Hints for Housekeepers

Cream soups are especially good for luncheon dishes.

Fur that has been wet will not mat if it is thoroughly brushed.

Backaches can sometimes be prevented by raising a sink, work table, or a washbub.

Hang the frequently-used kitchen utensil. It is much easier to find a small utensil like an egg-beater when it hangs on the wall than when it lies on a shelf or in a drawer among other utensils.

For uniform results in cooking, remember to sift flour before measuring and never to shake it down in the cup before leveling it. Standard measuring containers and level measurements are also necessary.

Doctor's 3 RULES Big Help to Bowels

What a joy to have the bowels move like clockwork, every day! It's easy, if you mind these simple rules of a famous old doctor:

1. Drink a big tumblerful of water before breakfast, and several times a day.
2. Get plenty of outdoor exercise without unduly fatiguing yourself.
3. Try for a bowel movement at exactly the same hour every day.

Everyone's bowels need help at times, but the thing to use is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. You'll get a thorough cleaning-out, and it won't leave your insides weak and watery. This family doctor's prescription is just fresh, laxative herbs, pure pepsin and other helpful ingredients that couldn't hurt a child. But how it wakes up those lazy bowels! How good you feel with your system rid of all that poisonous waste matter.

Clean up that coated tongue, sweeten that bad breath, and get rid of those bilious headaches. A little Syrup Pepsin will soon free the bowels from all that waste matter that makes the whole system sluggish. You'll eat better, sleep better and feel better.

You'll like the way Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin tastes. The way it works will delight you. Big bottles—all drugstores.

HAWAII'S GOLD No UNEMPLOYMENT IN THOSE HAPPY ISLANDS

Even mothers work in the busy season, but their children are cared for in the cannery

Girls wearing white caps and rubber gloves trim the pineapple as it comes from the Ginaca machine.

Field of matured pineapples ready to be picked for canning.

HERE is no unemployment in the Hawaiian Islands. Instead their citizens of all ages are busy sending a flood of gold in the form of Hawaiian pineapples all over the United States and also to many far distant lands. There is no unemployment in the story of how these semi-tropical islands happen to be one of the busiest parts of our country at this time when unemployment is so widespread. It is the romance of how the thought of one man greatly enlarged the whole economic aspect of these islands which we were once so reluctant to annex.

For our government was far from cordial to the idea of receiving Hawaii under its flag back in 1898 when an annexation treaty was first negotiated with President Harrison. This was withdrawn by President Cleveland in April of that year, but brought up again after President McKinley's election, and Hawaii was not finally admitted into the Union until July 7, 1898.

There was good reason for this reluctance. Just for the sake of acquiring a Pacific naval station this country did not want to assume the permanent financial liability which these islands seemed likely to prove. As late as its 1907-1908 edition the Encyclopedia Americana stated that "the danger of depending upon a single crop (sugar) has long been recognized, and persistent efforts have been made to develop minor industries" in Hawaii.

One Man Did It

To understand how Hawaii developed a second important crop which goes out as a flood of golden pineapples and forms one of the two great industries of the Hawaiian Islands, it is necessary to go back thirty years to the beginning of the career of one James D. Dole. It was in 1899 that this man, just graduated from Harvard, set out for the Hawaiian Islands from a suburb of Boston known as Jamaica Plain.

He went there to grow coffee. He knew nothing about pineapple culture. Neither did he know anything about canning. But after various experiments, he went back to Boston to get an expert canner and raise some capital, and he succeeded in both attempts.

After that the pineapple business began to prosper. The company which he formed packed 1,893 cases of pineapple in 1900, 8,810 cases in 1904, 25,000 in 1905 and more than 100,000 in 1907. Its pack grew to 200,000 cases in 1912, 1,000,000 in 1918; 2,000,000 in 1923; 3,000,000 in 1926; and from 3,347,204 cases in 1929 it grew to more than 4,000,000 last year.

Once this man had demonstrated that pineapples could be profitably grown in Hawaii, he naturally had competitors. There are now nine chief growers who packed a total of about 1,800,000 cases last year; nearly all of which were shipped to the United States and had a value of $45,000,000. No, there is no unemployment at present in Hawaii.

Room for More

In spite of this vastly increased production, the consumption of pineapples in the United States amounts to only a trifle more than two pineapples per capita a year. So there is room for even greater production. It can be brought about, but all of the good pineapple land in Hawaii is now taken, and when the island of Lanai, recently bought and developed into a huge pineapple plantation by Dole's company, is brought to full production, that will be about all the pineapple that Hawaii can supply.

The story of the acquisition of this island of Lanai is a whole romance in itself. Back in 1923 Dole was facing the problem of the need of more land for the growing of pineapples. It was estimated at that time that there were only about 99,000 acres in the islands adapted to pineapple culture. Of these his company then controlled about 25,000 acres, but he rightly believed the demand for canned pineapple would in a few years exceed the capacity of the industry's entire acreage.

So he sent men into the Philippines and down into Mexico, and investigated Fiji, San Domingo, Malaya and even Queensland, Australia, before coming back to the Hawaiian Islands and buying for $1,100,000 Lanai, considered up to that time a hopelessly barren island beaten ten months in the year by northeast winds beneath the blasts of which the scattering trees on it were permanently bowed.

There was no harbor then, no roads, no towns, no labor, and much of the good soil was covered with enormous cactuses. But the climate was just what the pineapple needed. The altitude, average rainfall and natural drainage were about right. Dole solved the problem of fighting the obstinate cactus by hitching a cable chain to heavy tractors and literally dragging the dense growth down.

He Bet $5,000,000

Dole was willing to bet $5,000,000 that his judgment in buying Lanai was right, and that he was right is proved by the fact that the yield of Lanai pineapples is today nearly equal to the combined yield of all the rest of his plantations. By cutting away the cliffs on one side, running a heavy breakwater out into the ocean on the other, and then dredging, he created the harbor of Kaunapali, at a cost of $750,000. He built a road for heavy trucking, seven miles back and 1,600 feet up into the island, along which five-ton White trucks hauling ten-ton trailers now travel, each carrying in all a net load of twenty-three and a half tons of fruit. At the harbor these are hoisted in eleven and a half ton lots onto barges which are towed to Honolulu some fifty miles away.

And this was not all. He brought water across the mountain range on the windward side of the island to the reservoir near the town of Lanai. City which stands today a model community of its kind. Its population now consists of 3,000 orientals and thirty-two whites, and it boasts its own bank, stores, schools, a hospital, a Buddhist temple, and even "movies" and a "Mayor."

There is no unemployment on the islands of Lanai, and neither is there any contract labor. The pineapple picker who wants to quit his job can draw his week's wages (from $14 up to as much as $23) and his transportation back to whence he came. The labor is a polyglot lot. Chinese, Filipinos and Hawaiians, even some Russians and Portuguese, live tranquilly in a community which is free from race problems largely because of thorough intermarriage.

A battery of shelling machines, known as "ginacas," removes the pineapple's skin and punches out its core in a single swift operation; a set of knives cuts the skinned and cored cylinders into uniform slices, and in a few seconds from the time the pineapple enters the Ginaca machine, it is skinned, cored, sliced and ready for grading and canning.

Speed is the essence of proper pineapple canning. The quicker you can get this luscious fruit out of its jacket and into the can, the better. Something more than food is preserved by this celerity. It is the only way to preserve the elusive flavor of the fully ripened fruit.

Still a Pioneer

This matter of grading is important. Dole wants the housewife to know exactly what she is buying in his cans. So he devised a system of stamping the numbers "one" or "two" or "three" together with his name in the top of the cans. This is a pioneer procedure which will undoubtedly extend to other canned products in the course of time.

When the housewife uses fresh fruit she can look at it and see its condition. When she uses canned fruit she has to depend on the labels to tell truthfully what quality of fruit is inside. The cans of pineapple with "one" stamped in their tops contain the best fruit in appearance, texture, syrup and color; those stamped "two" contain fruit just as fine but not quite so shapely and packed in syrup slightly less sweet; and those stamped "three" contain good, wholesome fruit, packed in the same syrup as "two," but sliced and have been broken so that they cannot be included in the first two grades. These first two grades are both packed in sliced, crushed and tidbit forms, but the third is packed only in broken slices.

Real Food Value

Is this large production of pineapple a real contribution to our diet in food value as well as in taste? According to scientists, it is.

"There are better sources of a single vitamin," says a bulletin of the University of Hawaii, "but as an all around source of vitamins the canned pineapple takes an unusually high place. No other canned product, except tomatoes, is as rich in vitamins."

But the fruit has to be handled right. There is a marked difference in its sugar content, depending upon whether it has been allowed to ripen on the plants or is picked for shipment after it has reached its full size but has not yet ripened. Analysis shows, according to this same authority, an average of 12.06% of sugar in the naturally ripened fruit, against 3.66% in that picked green and allowed to "ripen" off the plant. As a matter of universal practice among Hawaiian packers the fruit is allowed to ripen in the field.

The sugar content of pineapple is of a type which is ready for human assimilation, according to Dr. A. L. Dean, Director of the Experiment Station of the University of Hawaii, and pineapple has a higher food value than most fruits, largely because of its high sugar content and its vitamins.

Rich in Calories

The analysis of pineapple contained in the following table was made on a composite sample of both fruit and syrup made by commingling and mixing the contents of six cans of "Fancy" sliced pineapple taken at random from the pack of six different canneries:

Moisture	76.01%
Total Sugars	22.30%
Sucrose	0.99%
Reducing Sugars	12.31%
Protein	0.44%
Crude Fiber	0.30%
Mineral Matter (Ash)	0.23%
Fruit Acids (Calculated as Citric Acid)	0.59%

"It will be seen from the above," the bulletin states, "that the food value of canned pineapple, as measured by calories contained in it, is by no means negligible."

So James D. Dole, whose name is indelibly connected with the pineapple industry in Hawaii, both as pioneer and developer, not only turned a possible liability into a proved asset, but this industry is making a distinct contribution to our national diet in a form that is both nutritious and popular. And that is why there is no unemployment at present in those far flung Pacific islands.

How to Escape FLU

- 1 Avoid so far as possible the places where flu germs are most likely to be spread; overcrowded cars and public meeting places; overheated, stuffy rooms.
- 2 Be careful of close contact with others and beware of all coughers and sneezers; breathe through the nose, get fresh air, but avoid drafts or chilling.
- 3 Get lots of rest. Eat plenty of citrus fruits. Keep the bowels open. Take extra precaution to keep in good physical condition, so your system will have high resistance against germs.
- 4 Above all, avoid catching colds. They lower your resistance to the flu germ. Ward them off. At the first sign of any cold, take Bayer Aspirin and remain indoors if possible until your cold is gone. If you have a sore throat, dissolve some Bayer Aspirin tablets in water and gargle; this will relieve the soreness and reduce the inflammation.
- 5 If you have any reason to suspect even a touch of flu, call your doctor at once.

Long Hours of Sunshine

Important to Iceland
Health conditions in Iceland are excellent, Dr. Henry Dwight Chapin says in a report in Hygeia Magazine of a trip that he made to that northern island last summer.

Doctor Chapin was especially interested in the children. He found that infant mortality there was about the lowest in Europe—23.3 per 1,000. One factor he considered important in this result is that most of the infants are breast fed.

The climate of Iceland is favorable to health, Doctor Chapin believes. The prolonged daily sunshine, which in summer reaches twenty hours a day, is an important influence. Ultraviolet radiation is effective until 9:00 p. m. and the purity and clearness of the air favor the full effect of the sunshine.

SWEETEN ACID STOMACH THIS PLEASANT WAY

When there's distress two hours after eating—heartburn, indigestion, gas—suspect excess acid.

The best way to correct this is with an alkali. Physicians prescribe Phillips' Milk of Magnesia.

A spoonful of Phillips' Milk of Magnesia in a glass of water neutralizes many times its volume in excess acid; and does it at once. To try it is to be through with crude methods forever.

Be sure to get genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia. All drugstores have the genuine 25c and 50c bottles. Full directions in package.

Avoid Burns from Mustard Plasters

When you have Rheumatic or Muscular Pains in the back, chest or limbs or if you have a cold coming on, try this simple treatment. It is more convenient, safer, cleaner and more effective than mustard plaster.

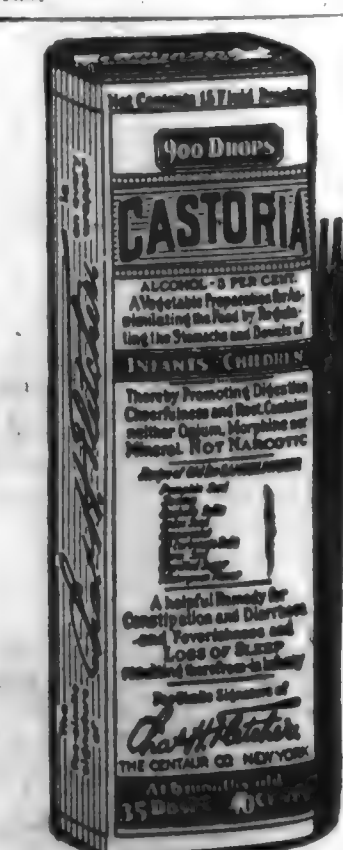

Get a bottle of Hoff's Liniment and apply it with brisk rubbing. Then saturate a cloth with Hoff's and apply to the painful area and in a few minutes you will feel the warming and stimulating effect of this powerful liniment.

Hoff's is different from ordinary liniments that are applied with rubbing alone. It brings a quick flow of blood to the affected area, reducing congestion and relieving pain. Get an eight ounce bottle of your druggist today for 60 cents. If you do not get relief in 30 minutes he is authorized to refund your money. Goodrich-Gamble Company, St. Paul, Minnesota.

Relieve COUGHS Quickly with Boschee's Syrup

A Fair Offer
She—What's in a name, anyhow?
He—Well, if you'll take mine you can get a good home out of it.

If you do a favor to a bad man the favor is lost; if you do ill to a good man it lasts for a length of time.—Plautus.

No more COLIC pains ... give Castoria

ACRY in the night may be the first warning that Baby has colic. No cause for alarm if Castoria is handy! This pure vegetable preparation brings quick comfort, and can never do the slightest harm. Always keep a bottle in the house. It is the safe and sensible thing when children are ailing. Whether it's the stomach, or the little bowels, colic or constipation, or diarrhea. When tiny tongues are coated, or the breath is bad. When there's need of gentle regulation. Every child loves the taste of Castoria, and its mildness makes it suitable for the tiniest infant, and for frequent use.

And a more liberal dose of Castoria is usually all that's needed to right the irregularities of older, growing children. Genuine Castoria has Chas. H. Fletcher's signature on the wrapper. It's prescribed by doctors.

Cross-Word
Carry

By DOROTHY DOUGLAS

CARRY had been going about for some time now with a far-away expression in her eyes and the thinnest of puckers between her brows.

Ted Conrad, the young man who had been courting her during the last year, didn't like it at all. He realized of late that, during his recitals of some of his most entertaining exploits on the football field, Carry's eyes drifted into that remote distance and her fingers tapped an almost invisible tattoo to the while.

If Ted had been less obtuse he would have known that Carry was bored and had taken, like the rest of the world, to cross-word puzzles. The far-away look meant that Carry was seeking an elusive word for poetical with an "M" and a "U" in the center and that the tattoos were merely the counting of letters.

But Ted would have been as much bored to work out a cross-word puzzle as Carry would have been to have to sit on a cold bench and watch Ted disporting himself on the football field.

As a matter of fact the big athlete and the dainty Carry were not particularly suited to each other. They had drifted into a love-like attitude during the summer when there had been swimming, boating, dancing and picnicking to entertain them.

She had not even told Ted that she was working on the $5,000 competition.

Carry had no hesitation about asking for information when she wanted it, and, of course, it was always forthcoming, especially if the wise one were masculine and Carry happened to look up at him with her big violet eyes with their most pleading expression.

She had so far conquered the telegraph clerk in the post office, whither she went for a code in three letters, and she had made a perfect slave of the young man in charge of the reference department of the local library.

Carry was on her way there on a bright and sunny morning in November to get the no doubt atrociously long and unpronounceable horticultural name for an innocent little garden flower.

There was more than a nip of frost in the air and Carry's cheeks were a healthy scarlet. She was a wee bit cold, otherwise she might have continued her walk to the library and the young swain therein. As it was, she decided to go into the long row of hot houses that sheltered the glory of the flower world in that part of the country. It would be far more interesting and certainly warmer than the village library. Carry loved flowers.

Carry paused on the threshold in sheer delight. The hot fragrance of the flowers together with their glorious colors gave her the sensation of having stepped from a cold silent world into one of life and warmth and love. She inhaled the warm odors deep into her lungs and was enjoying herself to the utmost when she realized that a young man had entered the green house and was waiting her pleasure.

Carry put the violet eyes into use and the young man of course realized that some one as lovely as the flowers was questioning him.

"Oh, I say," he laughed genially, "are you working on those sticklers, too? I have lost weight and three nights' good sleep on one word."

Carry burst out laughing and Braden stopped to listen. "Which one is it? Perhaps I have found it," she questioned.

"We will have to share that $5,000 if we help each other," laughingly replied Braden. He drew from his pocket the familiar cross-word puzzle and pointed out to Carry's amused eyes the simplest word of the lot. "There," he said, "that word, 'Binged'—I never heard such a word, and it's not in any dictionary, synonym book nor any other book that I can find. Its clue, as you know is, 'most modern girls have it.'"

"Binged is a perfectly good word," Carry exploded into merriment. "It is a cross between a shingle and a bob." She pulled off her hat and showed the astonished young man what a bingle was, and he had to admit to himself that at was something very lovely in this particular instance.

"And now for the flower. It is so simple to me that I can't think of anyone not getting it." And with that he wrote down a conglomeration of letters that made Carry gasp. It fitted in, of course.

"I wouldn't even attempt to pronounce it," she laughed. "It is very good of you to help me."

When the violet eyes lifted again to Braden's face he hoped with all his heart that there would be at least one or two more horticultural names to bring this young lady to his green house.

Carry hoped the same.

As a matter of fact, while she was thinking about it, the young man was getting, with a tenderness that proclaimed the flower lover, a few exquisite buds and a moment later was putting them into her eager hands.

"We've split that $5,000," he said, "I get it. Don't you think we should work out the next puzzle together?"

"It certainly is easier," Carry admitted.

PROFITING THROUGH SERVICE

When merchants build new stores, add additional sales space, install new fixtures, improve their show windows, augment their sales forces, replenish their stocks with the best and newest, it is for the public. Of course they are in business for the purpose of making a living, but to make that living they must first give service, so their first objective is always "to serve and please."

"Fair exchange is no robbery" is a business phrase that has been handed down from generation to generation and now seems to have acquired immortality. The laborer exchanges his labor for his wage. The capitalist exchanges his money for his interest. The manufacturer exchanges his products for his cost of production plus profit, the professional man exchanges his services for his fees or his salary, the store keeper exchanges his goods for cost plus service charge. Everybody is in business for somebody else. Like the public official, the merchant is in business for society and therefore every member of that society is his employer, his boss.

One of the compensations of business is that public recognition and appreciation come to none sooner than to the businessman who really serves. A flourishing trade, is synonymous with public trust and confidence. Service must ever precede success in business.

GREEN FEED-ROUGHAGE FIBER IN POULTRY FEEDING

(By Prof. H. D. Munroe)

Throughout the east there is a growing demand for roughage in the mash feeds for poultry. Several years ago poultry mashers were high in fiber content. State laws, experiment station recommendations and competition have caused a great reduction in the amount of fiber found in commercial mashes. At the same time, poultry feeders have been neglecting the succulent green feeds. There is no doubt but that the combined conditions are responsible for some of our poultry troubles.

As is usual with a new thought in poultry management, this fiber question will be overdone. We will then have troubles resulting from too much fiber and finally strike an average amount that will give satisfactory results.

At the present time many poultrymen are demanding a coarser mash. Corn, bran, or oats will have the same amount of fiber whether ground coarse or fine. Many feeders do not realize the difference between coarse ground feeds and feeds that contain a high amount of fiber.

Succulent green feeds are a very important part of the poultry ration. These feeds have three important values. The succulent value is the extra water that the birds consume when they eat this type of feed. It has a tendency to prevent constipation. The green value is vitamin A and some vitamin D. The roughage value comes from the fiber content of these feeds. Young, tender grass, clover or alfalfa are ideal green feeds that answer all three requirements. For growing stock, or laying hens, this type of feed is very important. For birds that are on bare yards or confined to the houses we must find substitutes for these feeds.

Roughage in the poultry ration will answer only one of these three important requirements. Alfalfa leaf meal in the mash does not fully answer the problem. Sprouted oats or cabbage do not answer the problem in full.

The wise poultry feeder is not going to buy roughage in the mash feeds but is going to supply roughage as such.

NEWVILLE CLUB
RECENTLY ORGANIZED

The Newville Township Home Bureau Club which was just recently organized held their monthly meeting February 11th in the afternoon at the home of Mrs. Mamie Gintner.

The meeting was opened by the president, Mrs. Blen Moore. Song, Bringing in the Sheaves. All repeated the Lord's Prayer. Minutes were read and approved. At the roll call each answered by repeating a Motto of Lincoln.

A very good talk on poultry was given by Millie Enzor. The history of Lincoln was given by Mrs. Myra Conine. A reading on Poultry written by Abner Doolittle was given by Mrs. Daisy Roberts.

Why We Keep Valentine Day was read by Katha Roberts. Work on removing old varnish or refinishing old furniture by Mrs. Blen Moore, followed by general discussion. A contest was given by Mrs. Leno Piermah which proved much merrier.

The next meeting will be with Mrs. Daisy Roberts.

DOINGS OF THE INDIANA LEGISLATURE

Indianapolis, Feb. 18.—Up to now the record of the 1931 State Legislature is a blank.

Between today and the early morning of March 10, it can be expected that it will send to Governor Leslie more than 200 bills to be offered, unless he disappears, as the new laws of Indiana. To date, less than a score have reached him and these are of relative minor importance. There are, however, almost 800 awaiting action.

Virtually every "frank" bill has originated in the Democrat House. Its calendar contains the biggest assortment of outlandish proposals ever presented to an Indiana Assembly in recent years. Each bill introduction period reveals such extravagant suggestions for law that it appears that some of the legislators sit up at night thinking of schemes to jar the teeth out of business enterprises. These bills are so numerous that it has been impossible for the press to give more than fragmentary publicity about them. Of course they will not pass, but leaders of the Assembly are beginning to eye with suspicion the flood of bills of this nature. Next Saturday, the bill introduction period will end. After that date no bills can be introduced without unanimous consent.

The Republican Senate has centered attention largely on economy by reducing expenses, its action being limited by the constitutional provision that tax legislation must originate in the House. The Senate's most important action probably was the passage of the Beckett-Huff Bill, indorsed at the Republican caucus, which calls for a 10 per cent cut in all local budgets in the next two years. House Democrats are complaining that this may mean salary cuts for Democrat office holders in the cities and the counties and whether they will join in passing the measure is problematical.

After being in session five weeks the House finally got down to real effort on the income tax, but then only after a demonstration by Professor Paul McNutt, the chief campaign orator, and State Chairman Peters, that campaign promises would be paid off even at the expense of tax payers. The result was that another week went by, but the House permitted it to pass with literally no practical steps taken toward relief for owners of real property.

Despite eloquent platform and campaign promises, the House, in which all revenue raising measures must be initiated, appears to be possessed of inertia that precludes the taking of definite steps toward tax relief.

The week was concluded with a battle in the House over the two income tax bills that is indicative of the indecision that seems to possess the Democratic majority. It repeats rehearsal here, with a brief review of what has taken place on the two income tax bills, personal and corporation.

The 1929 Legislature adjourned after instructing Governor Harry G. Leslie to appoint a tax survey commission to investigate the taxation problem facing Indiana. The commission was to recommend some steps for relief. After two years of tiresome inquiry and research, the commission worked out, among others, two bills, one providing a personal income tax and the other taxing the net incomes of corporations. The Democratic platform, in the 1930 campaign, pledged adoption of such relief measures.

As the 1931 legislative session opened, a number of income tax bills were introduced. Two among them summarized the conclusions of the survey commission and two more, differing widely from the others, contained the Democratic ideas on the subject. Several more were introduced, but they were inconsequential in character.

The House ways and means committee—or rather, the Democratic members of it, with the assistance of R. Earl Peters of Fort Wayne, Democratic State Chairman—studied the bills that had been introduced and finally, either to appease the Republican Senate and House members or because they actually thought the survey commission's bills were best, decided to adopt them.

The survey commission measure on personal incomes provided for a tax varying from 1 per cent on the first $1,000 of net taxable income to 4 per cent on net taxable incomes of $10,000 or more. The corporation income tax provided for a 3 per cent tax on net taxable incomes. Deductions in the personal income tax were $1,000 for individuals, $2,000 for family heads, and $200 for each additional dependent. The term "net taxable income" means the income above all exemptions.

In other words, a married man with one child under 18 years of age would have an exemption of $2,400 before he began to pay the tax at all.

The measures apparently were quite satisfactory to the Republican members of the House, and a spirit of co-operation was manifested. The bills were introduced early last week, were referred to the committee on ways and means, and within five minutes they were recommended for passage by that committee, which had drafted them. Speaker Walter Myers, Indianapolis Democrat and ex-candidate for United States Senator, apparently was delighted. The bills, he said, would be handed down on second reading on Tuesday, and would be passed, if possible, not later than Thursday so that they could be sent to the Republican Senate for action. Then something happened. No one except those who are highest in Democratic circles apparently knows what it was. Whether Prof. McNutt decided that he would just have to get a finger in the taxation pie or was called into consultation by Mr. Peters, no one knows, but Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday were spent by Mr. McNutt in the Democratic State Headquarters drafting a multitude of amendments. When the bills were handed down for second reading on Friday afternoon, the amendments were presented.

They increased the exemption for individuals from $1,000 to $1,500; the exemption for family heads from $2,000 to $3,500 and the exemption for dependents from $200 to $400. Representative Delph L. McKesson of Plymouth, Democratic "whip" of the House, explained that the amendments merely made the exemptions conform to the Federal income tax law and provided for the taxation of incomes of persons who live outside the state but are employed within it.

The Democrats apparently intended to "steam roller" the amendments through, but the entire Republican delegation to the House began a noisy but determined opposition.

"Neither I nor any of the minority members know what those bills contain," shouted Representative James M. Knapp of Hagerstown, Republican floor leader and former speaker of the House, "but if they are all right, why this haste to rush them through?"

A flurry of debate and contention followed, with Representative Knapp, Miles Furnas of Winchester, Howard S. Grimm of Auburn, Edil J. Kistler of Elkhart and others, all Republicans, fighting the amendments bitterly.

"You say that you came here to provide the poor real estate owner with tax relief?" questioned Representative Kistler. "Let me tell you what these two amendments will do. Let us take two men, one of whom is making $2,500 a year and is the owner of a home, while the other makes $3,500 a year and owns no real estate. Suppose that the poor man owns a $2,500 property, free of mortgage. He will pay at his local tax rate between $50 and $75 a year as taxes on his real estate, and the man who makes $3,500 a year but owns no property will pay nothing. You may call that justice, but I don't."

"I haven't any doubt that this very capably represents what the Democratic platform pledged on income tax," said Representative C. Y. Foster of Carmel, Republican.

Representative McKesson was standing by the Speaker's rostrum listening to the Republican addresses and making an occasional response. Another Representative, a Democrat, hurried up the aisle to McKesson.

"Why don't you have Myers gavel this through?" he demanded excitedly. "What have we got a majority for?"

"I can't do it, John," said McKesson. "It wouldn't do. There's too much opposition."

Speaker Myers ended the debate by suggesting that the sole reason for the haste was to advance the bills toward their passage as rapidly as possible. He added that since the Republicans objected so strenuously, it might be as well to have the amendments printed. McKesson immediately suggested that he and Knapp be appointed a committee of two to go through the amendments, eliminate duplication, and then have 300 copies made of the remainder. This was done. The amendments were considered at the first night meeting of the session Monday.

Mr. McNutt's interest in the tax situation is problematical, but as he explained it to the House ways and means committee, he was coming to the committee to see that the platform pledges were carried out.

One other interesting phase of the taxation situation developed during the last week. Early in the session, the Democrats were claiming credit for the passage of a bill introduced by Representative Jacob Weiss of Indianapolis, a Democrat. It relieved delinquent taxpayers of the necessity of paying their current taxes immediately and also removed penalties after the delinquent tax sale is conducted. Friday, however, a bill was introduced by Representative Albert F. Walsman of Indianapolis, tax expert, to repeal the Weiss law. Representative Weiss' Bill had brought a storm of opposition from county treasurers, Democrat and Republican, in all parts of the state. It was charged that it removed any inducement for investors to purchase delinquent property, and that it would reduce the receipts from such sales by $300,000 in Marion County alone, which means that the treasury of the county would be short that much at least. Representative Walsman is a Democratic member of the ways and means committee.

A similar bill, which relieves delinquents of the necessity of paying their 1931 taxes until the regular dates for such payment, but which does not remove the penalties attached to the property sale, and which, therefore, will not remove the inducement to investors, was passed by the House in lieu of the Democratic measures. This bill originated in the Senate from the desk of Alonzo H. Lindley of Kingman, a Republican.

Only one other legislative issue of maximum importance cropped up during the last week. It was the prohibition question, concerning which two fiery hearings were held in the House Chamber before the committee on public morals. One of the bills provided for the repeal of the Wright "bone dry" law and the other legalized the sale of medicinal liquor. An excited, madly milling house in the Indiana general assembly Monday voted down, 50 to 45, an amendment to the Wright "bone dry" law to permit the sale of medicinal whiskey.

NEW LAW TO FORCE TAX PAYMENT ON AUTOMOBILES

A senate measure to force payment of taxes upon every auto in Indiana was passed by a vote of 30 to 10 today and sent to the house with the understanding that minor amendments would be made there.

Lee J. Hartzell, republican, Fort Wayne, introduced the bill, which provided that the county assessor be made an ex-officio agent of the secretary of state for issuance of auto licenses; each vehicle to be assessed for taxation at the time of issuance of the license and the tax to be collected before the license is granted.

Provision was included that the assessor collect 25 cent notary fee, 10 cents of which shall go to the state general fund.

Hartzell said 18,000 autos in Allen county escaped taxation each year, and that 22,000 drivers paid no license fees.

NEWVILLE BOOTLEGGERS AND WIFE GETS A RIDE

Ray Hart, 40, and wife, Edna Hart, living near the Indiana-Ohio line southeast of Newville, were placed in the county jail Monday afternoon on charges of the sale and possession of liquor.

Sheriff John P. Hoff, Deputy Sheriff Grimm and Chief of Police Davis, who made the arrests, brought back a load of liquor which included about 150 bottles of beer, 3 gallons of wine, 8 quarts of moonshine whiskey and a considerable amount of cordials, liquor coloring, flavoring and glycerine.

The arrests came about through the information of four high school boys from Hicksville, Ohio. The boys had been at Hart's place Sunday and one of them became intoxicated.

When taken before Judge Endicott in the DeKalb circuit court Monday afternoon, both Hart and his wife pleaded guilty to the sale of liquor. Hart was given a sentence of 90 days to the state farm and his wife drew a like sentence to the women's prison. Each was fined $100 and costs. Hart asked the court for time to make arrangements for the care of his live stock, but his request was refused. The affidavits were signed by Robert Steele and the names of the state witnesses indorsed on the affidavits were Woodrow Haver, Lynn Shirley and Mark Greene.

INCREASE IN AUTO LICENSES PROPOSED

Indianapolis, Indiana, Feb. 24, 1931.—The motorist as a class is now being harnessed as the tax goat just as we have predicted all along that he would be if the motorizing public would stand for it. The proposed plan now being sponsored is to collect the license fees on an entirely new basis thus confusing the mind of the public to cover up the fact that the license fee is to be greatly boosted, in some cases as much as 140%. The idea is to put a lot more tax onto the motorist and put this money into the general fund then take as much as possible of the present license fees and some of the gas tax, if it can be had, and, all told, make the motorist pay not only a lot more tax, but take away some that he is already paying for good roads thus by this means depriving him of the good roads he was promised when they put on the increased tax the previous two sessions, and use all this money to relieve other classes of taxation.

Such was the analysis of the situation as announced by the Hoosier State Automobile Association, and their statement on the subject continues as follows:

"There are approximately 900,000 automobile owners. They pay a personal property tax on their automobile, a great big gas tax, a license fee, and certificate of title fee and a driver's license fee. It is time to call a halt. Any new tax put on the automobile is never going to be removed nor is it going to be used for the motorist. "Every motorist has one or more voters in his family and unless he intends to stand idly by like a little lamb for slaughter it is high time that he rise up and make the people in the legislature understand that he does not want any more taxes put on the automobile, and that he would like to have the money he is now paying for good roads continue for good roads without having his State highway law all torn to pieces. If the Legislature makes the motorist produce a receipt for his property tax on the automobile that is all right—no motorist should be allowed to escape that, but why tax him beyond all reason to relieve all other forms of taxation?" —Hoosier State Auto Association.

BALTIMORE LADY WRITES ST. JOE RELATIVES

Below we print excerpts from a letter written by Mrs. Emma (Curie) Skilling, of Baltimore, to one of the family here.

"The death of Amelia Benninghoff recalls to me the time when she and I were colleagues in the profession of teaching. More than any of the others she was always kindly disposed toward me and we were good friends. In our institute work, we formed a habit of good literature which has always followed me through the years, and incidentally I seem to have transmitted it to our children. Kathryn has never ceased to read and study since she left college, and her knowledge is being translated into service.

"Francis has just received an appointment at Massachusetts Eye and Ear Hospital (connected with Harvard University) for the next two years. At the Albany Hospital where he is at present, he met a Russian woman doctor who, not noticing his middle name (Curie) said: that one of the interesting experiences of her training was as a student at the University of Paris under Pierre Curie. She related many intimate details of Prof. and Madame Curie.

"Jack is in his last semester at Harvard Law School. If he finishes in June I shall journey up to Cambridge with a crown, due him for overcoming great difficulties.

"Measured by the distance of thirty-five years, when I was associated with Millie, I fell as though I have come a long, long way, and I think of many things. John and I have more time now to devote to ourselves and we find life so full of nice things.

"We have had no snow here yet, in another month I shall be gardening, God willing."

With love, Emma.

DEATH OF SPENCERVILLE BABY

Claron, the seven months old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Leo Chapman of Spencerville, died Monday afternoon of double pneumonia. The child had been sick since Thursday.

Lesson for March 1

JESUS SENDING FORTH MISSIONARIES

GOLDEN TEXT—Therefore said he unto them, the harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few: pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth laborers into his harvest.
LESSON TEXT—Luke 10:1-22.
PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Trying Out His Helpers.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Helpers of Jesus.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Our Missionary Task.

The sending forth of the seventy was for a special time and purpose. The missionary enterprise today has much in common with that of that day, but there are certain essential differences which should be recognized.

1. The Seventy Sent Forth (vv. 1, 2).
a. Appointed by the Lord (v. 1). They went forth not merely because of an inner urge but because of personal and direct appointment. Only those should go forth as missionaries who are appointed by the Lord.
b. Sent two by two (v. 1). The purpose of this was that they might mutually help, counsel, and support each other.
c. The reason for their appointment (v. 2). It was the greatness of the harvest and the fewness of the laborers.
d. The force back of missions (v. 2). The disciples were instructed to pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth laborers. Prayer indited by the Holy Spirit has been back of every missionary enterprise.
- II. The Seventy Instructed (vv. 3-10).
a. As to the source of their commission (v. 3). "I send you." Everything depends upon the authority of the commission. No missionary should go forth without the consciousness of being sent by the Lord.
b. As to the dangers confronting them (v. 3). Missionaries thrust forth by the Lord will be exposed to deadly peril.
c. As to their support (v. 4). Being sent forth by the Lord, they were to look to him to provide for their need.
d. As to the speed of their mission (v. 4). So urgent was the need of the speedy evangelization of the Jewish territory that the distractions of social intercourse were to be omitted.
e. As to behavior in homes where received (vv. 5-9).

- a. Offer the peace of the gospel (vv. 5, 6). This is to be done regardless as to whether it will be received or not. There is a reflex blessing in preaching the gospel.
- b. Do not shift quarters (vv. 7, 8). Missionaries should remain in the home where they have been received, content with what is given them. They should not demand better food and more comfortable quarters than are commonly provided.
- c. Heal the sick (v. 9). These disciples were given power to heal the sick. The ministers of Christ should seek to give relief to those in distress and use every opportunity to proclaim the gospel message.
- d. The awful fate of those who reject Christ's message (vv. 10-16). Their case is more hopeless than that of Sodom. Those who reject Christ's messengers reject Christ and reject the Heavenly Father who sent him.

- III. The Return of the Seventy (vv. 17-24).
a. Their report (v. 17). They were highly elated. They found that they could not only heal the sick, but cast out demons also. It is as easy even in Christian service to be spoiled by our successes.
- b. Jesus' answer (vv. 18-24). (a) He told them that it was no surprise to him (vv. 18 and 19). With prophetic eye, he saw their success as indicating that time when the prince of this world would be overthrown (John 12:31). By virtue of his mighty triumph over Satan, he assured them that they need have no fear of what should befall them. (b) Real cause for rejoicing (v. 20). He promptly rebuked them, telling them that their chief joy should be because of their heavenly relation, not because of these miraculous gifts. (c) Jesus' exultation (vv. 21, 22). The consciousness that soon the victory would be won because God had committed all things unto him and that only as men received him could they know the Father caused him to rejoice in what was being accomplished. (d) Congratulate the disciples (vv. 23, 24). He assured them that they were sharing privileges which had been denied to many of the prophets and kings.

By His Presence
When God possesses us we are possessed by his presence, and the Holy Spirit cannot be in us without purifying our thoughts, desires and motives and so equipping us for his service.—W. E. Griffith Thomas.

Boundless Possibilities
Oh, I am staggered as I think of the boundless possibilities that God opens before the man whose whole nature is filled with His Spirit!—Selected.

Avoid Burns from Mustard Plasters

When you have Rheumatic or Muscular Pains in the back, chest or limbs or if you have a cold coming on, try this simple treatment. It is more convenient, safer, cleaner and more effective than mustard plaster.
Get a bottle of Hoff's Liniment and apply it with brisk rubbing. Then saturate a cloth with Hoff's and apply to the painful area and in a few minutes you will feel the warming and stimulating effect of this powerful liniment.
Hoff's is different from ordinary liniments that are applied with rubbing alone. It brings a quick flow of blood to the affected area, reducing congestion and relieving pain. Get an eight ounce bottle of your druggist today for 60 cents. If you do not get relief in 30 minutes he is authorized to refund your money. Goodrich-Gamble Company, St. Paul, Minnesota.

Suggestion on Unemployment
A neat and vigorous little woman of sixty appeared at the New York city hall the other day, demanding to tell the mayor that she thought it perfectly outrageous that so many big, able-bodied men were standing around on street corners selling apples "when they ought to be out looking for strong men's jobs."—Collier's Weekly.

STOMACH UPSET, SOUR? THIS WILL COMFORT

Don't let sour stomach, gas, indigestion make you suffer. And don't use crude methods to get relief. Just take a spoonful of Phillips' Milk of Magnesia in a glass of water. It instantly neutralizes many times its volume in excess acid. It will probably end your distress in five minutes.
Phillips' Milk of Magnesia is the perfect way to end digestive disorders due to excess acid for men, women, children—and even babies. Endorsed by doctors, used by hospitals.
Your druggist has the 25c and 50c sizes. Insist on the genuine.

Work a National Blessing
Money which comes without effort doesn't build a good life or a sound civilization.—Collier's Weekly.

To keep clean and healthy take Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. They regulate liver, bowels and stomach.—Adv.

In plagiarism, don't go any further than the hunch. It's a shame to steal the words, too.

Garfield Tea

Was Your Grandmother's Remedy
For every stomach and intestinal ill. This good old-fashioned herb home remedy for constipation, indigestion, flatulency, gas, and other derangements of the system so prevalent these days is in even greater favor as a family medicine than in your grandmother's day.

CHIN. Agents to sell tested china and commission. "Take 31,000 share, time" Indiana. Hatcher, Fort Wayne, Indiana.
Special Opportunity in This Vicinity for man or lady. Comfort with manufacturing marketing new product. No competition. Big profits. Extra Sales Co., La Crosse, Wis.

Flores Chemical Works, Patagonia, N. Y.

FLORESTON SHAMPOO—Ideal for use in connection with Parker's Hair Balsam. Makes the hair soft and fluffy. 50 cents by mail or at druggists. Flores Chemical Works, Patagonia, N. Y.

FOR BRUISES

HANFORD'S Balsam of Myrrh

The Ideal Vacation Land

Sunshine All Winter Long
Splendid roads—towering mountain ranges—Highest type hotels—dry invigorating air—clear starlit nights—California's Foremost Desert Playground
Write Geo. A. Chaffey
Palm Springs, CALIFORNIA

Sacred Mistletoe

The Druids held the mistletoe in reverence because of its mysterious birth.

You do not have to "develop personality." The personality will take care of that.

For safety and for whiter washes—Rinso!
THE makers of 40 famous washers say "Use Rinso!" This granulated hard-water soap washes clothes whiter. It does the work faster. And it's safe for the finest linens.
Cup for cup, Rinso gives twice as much suds as lightweight, puffed-up soaps—even in hardest water. No bar soaps, chips, powders, softeners needed.
Great for tub washing, too. Soaks out dirt—saves scrubbing. That saves the clothes! Get the BIG package. You'll like Rinso's lasting suds for dishes too.
[TUNE IN on Rinso Talks. "What Happened to Jane?" Tues. & Thurs. 5:30 p. m. E.S.T. WEAF and associated stations.]

NOTICE TO CONTRACTORS OF THE CONSTRUCTION OF A CONCRETE HIGHWAY

State of Indiana,
County of DeKalb, ss:

In the Commissioners Court of DeKalb County, Indiana,
In the Matter of the St. Joe and Spencer Highway in DeKalb County, Indiana.

Notice is hereby given that the Board of Commissioners of DeKalb County, Indiana, will up to the hour of 10:00 o'clock A. M. on the 3rd day of March, 1931, at the Commissioners Court Room in the court house in the City of Auburn, receive sealed proposals for the improvement of a highway in said county which said improvement is known by and designated as the Alvin Steckley et al Highway in the said plans and specifications and profiles aforesaid.

That the estimated cost of the said improvement is the sum of One Hundred Thirty-Five Thousand Three Hundred and Sixty Dollars and Sixteen Cents, ($135,356.16).

That the length of said highway to be improved is about (5.2) miles and is described as follows: beginning at a point on what is known as the H. M. Widney et al improved gravel road; said point being approximately 1800 feet north of the south-east corner of Section 15, Concord Township, DeKalb County, Indiana, and runs from thence as follows: West to First Street in the Town of St. Joe; thence South on First Street to Washington Street; thence West on Washington Street to the Section line road; thence South and South-west on the section line road on what is commonly called the St. Joe, Spencer Highway to the village of Spencer, Indiana, thence South and South-west through Spencer on what is known as the Spencer Highway, Leo Road; ending at a point on the DeKalb-Alton County Line; said point being approximately 900 feet East of the South-West corner of Section 32, Spencer Township, DeKalb County, Indiana.

Each bidder must submit with his proposal a bond with sufficient surety, payable to the State of Indiana, in the penal sum, double the amount of his proposal, conditioned for the performance of the work on which he bids. If personal sureties are given, they shall be residents and free holders of the State of Indiana. Each bidder must submit with his proposal an affidavit to the effect that he has not entered into any combination or collusion or agreement with any person relative to the price to be bid by any one; that he has done nothing to prevent anyone from bidding; that his bid is made without reference to any other person.

Said improvement will be let as a whole to the lowest responsible bidder duly qualifying as such. The Board reserves the right to reject any and all bids.

The work shall be completed within a time to be fixed by agreement between the Board of County Commissioners and the successful bidder.

Witness my hand and seal this 4th day of February, 1931.

NOTICE TO CONTRACTORS OF THE CONSTRUCTION OF A HIGHWAY

State of Indiana,
County of DeKalb, ss:

In the Commissioners Court of DeKalb County, Indiana,
In the Matter of the Alvin Steckley et al Highway in Wilmington Township, DeKalb County, Indiana.

Notice is hereby given that the Board of Commissioners of DeKalb County, Indiana, will up to the hour of 10:00 A. M. on the 3rd day of March, 1931, at the Commissioners Court Room in the court house in the City of Auburn, receive sealed proposals for the improvement of a highway in said county which said improvement is known by and designated as the Alvin Steckley et al Highway in Wilmington Township, which said improvement is petitioned for by Alvin Steckley et al and will consist of draining, grading and paving of said road, as set out in the plans and specifications and profiles, now on file in the Auditor's office of said county.

Said proposals received, will be for all materials used, all labor performed, and for the full completion of the said improvement in accordance with the report of the Engineer and Viewers, and the said plans and specifications and profiles aforesaid.

That the estimated cost of the said improvement is the sum of eight thousand two hundred and forty dollars and sixty cents, ($8,240.60).

That the length of said highway to be improved is about (2) miles and is described as follows: beginning at the South-west corner of the North-west quarter of Section fifteen (15), Wilmington Township, DeKalb County, Indiana, and running thence east on the half section line, a distance of two miles, through Sections fifteen (15) and fourteen (14) to the Butler-St. Joe Highway and there to end; shall be established and improved by the construction of a turn pike gravel road over the entire route of said road as above described.

Each bidder must submit with his proposal a bond with sufficient surety, payable to the State of Indiana, in the penal sum, double the amount of his proposal, conditioned for the performance of the work on which he bids. If personal sureties are given, they shall be residents and free holders of the State of Indiana. Each bidder must submit with his proposal an affidavit to the effect that he has not entered into any combination or collusion or agreement with any person relative to the price to be bid by any one; that he has done nothing to prevent anyone from bidding; that his bid is made without reference to any other person.

Hamilton lake is said by those who have seen it recently to be the lowest in many years. The surface of the water is described as being five or six feet lower than normal and the water has receded from the banks as much as a hundred and fifty feet. A lack of rain this winter following the drought of last summer is attributed as the cause.

When it was learned last week that Abraham Mier of Ligonier was to be appointed as receiver of the Noble County Bank and Trust Co., at Kendallville, and while he was consulting officials concerning same, a petition was hurriedly circulated about the town and 1,000 signatures were secured asking him to resign, but before the petition could be presented him, he hurriedly left for home.

The publication of the Noble County Democrat at Albion by B. R. Matteson, has again been resumed after suffering the loss of business for a few weeks caused by fire in the opera house block, where the paper is located. An open house was held some days ago and many hundreds of visitors were welcomed to see the plant in full operation. Many editors from surrounding towns attended. Here's hoping that the Democrat shall never have a like experience.

While starting a fire under the doughnut vat at the Seely Bakery Saturday Russell King was severely burned about the hands, arms, chest and the back of his neck. Mr. King was using crankcase oil to build the fire, when it ignited unexpectedly and exploded with flames for a moment. A fire extinguisher close at hand was used by a fellow employee to put out the fire. This is believed to have prevented consequences, although Mr. King's condition is still serious.

From the standpoint of nutrition, the egg is really two foods, rather than one. The white part is almost a pure watery solution of certain proteins of high quality for body-building and maintenance. The yolk furnishes not only fat and protein of fine quality, but has an unusually rich store of the minerals and vitamins necessary for growth and development. Children need an egg a day, if possible.

The Loyal Happy Hustlers class of the Christian Sunday School will present next Sunday morning a two act missionary play in connection with the missionary lesson. The play is directed by the teacher, Mrs. H. C. Borthwick. Those taking part in the play which is entitled "Aunt Fanny's Miracle," are Mrs. Lester Pugsley, Mrs. Lena Maxwell, Mrs. Willard Hurst, Mrs. Doris Yeiser, Mrs. Lena Meek and Mrs. Dorothea Kessler. All are welcome to enjoy the play, which contains a fine missionary lesson.

Deadly Visitation

The "black death" is the name given to an aggravated epidemic of the oriental plague which swept over Asia, Africa and Europe in 1348-49. The disease turned the bodies of its victims black, hence the name. More than 25,000 people perished in Europe alone, and the death toll in Asia and northern Africa was much greater.

Mrs. Nelson H. Short of Archbold, Ohio, spent Tuesday with John Leichy and family.

Miss Elnora Leichy is spending a few weeks with her sister, Mrs. Nelson H. Short of near Archbold, Ohio.

Mrs. Charles Chapman and Mrs. George Krumbigel were Thursday afternoon callers at the John Leichy home.

Mr. and Mrs. Orlo Warner and Chas. Folsom were Sunday dinner guests of Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Page and sons.

Mr. Shemran Frederickson injured his ankle while working in the woods last week and has to use crutches to walk.

Messrs Elmer Smith, Lloyd Snyder and Laurel Gratz spent one evening last week at Hurststown with Misses Dorothy and Helen Hursh and Marian Howey.

Miss Loma Warner and Mr. Max Steel, both students at Depauw, spent the week end with Miss Warner's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. F. Warner and son, Franklin.

Mr. and Mrs. Milton Holloper and son and grandson, arrived Saturday from North Vernon, where they have lived for some time. They expect to settle in this community soon.

Clarence Snyder, of Columbus, Ohio, spent a few days last week with his parents, his father, Mr. Warren Snyder returned home and stayed several days. He is now back at Leo.

Mrs. Louis Smead and family, Mr. and Mrs. Ray Meidinger and Mrs. Albert Reigscher and son had supper at the home of Mr. and Mrs. David Neuhauser and family Friday evening.

There are quite a few people sick at this writing.

Mr. and Mrs. Elmer Akey and family spent Sunday with Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Akey.

Mr. and Mrs. Jos. S. Neuhauser and family visited the infirmary near Huntstown Sunday afternoon.

Messrs Paul, Glenn and Edgar Lederman were afternoon callers at the home of the John Leichy family.

The ladies of the Culture Club were very pleasantly entertained at the home of Mrs. Henry Keesler in Auburn, Wednesday evening, February 18.

The rooms were beautifully decorated in the patriotic colors, red, white and blue. Pictures of George Washington conspicuously decorated the curtains, and his little hatchet and the cherry tree were also in evidence.

A paper, The Romances of Lincoln was well given by Mrs. Lena Maxwell after the study of the lesson. Twenty members responded to roll call with patriotic quotations.

The hostess served sandwiches, olives, brick ice cream, cake and coffee. A tiny bow flag on a fancy pin was found on each sandwich and these were retained as favors. A rising vote of thanks was given the hostess for her hospitality.

An Important Message to You And Your Loved Ones

WHEN you realize that nearly SIXTY per cent of the expense part of life insurance premiums is used to pay for SELLING the insurance to you—$603,538,769.97 during 1929 alone—you will instantly grasp the great importance TO YOU of this message.

Time was when life insurance—the safest and best plan for protecting your loved ones—needed to be sold by salesmen.

That time is PAST! Today everyone knows that legal reserve life insurance is an absolute family necessity, and it is now eagerly BOUGHT, rather than sold.

Many thousands of thrifty people the country over are literally flooding the Union Mutual Life with more than sixty millions in applications for its wonderful new policy which you can obtain WITHOUT MEDICAL EXAMINATION—WITHOUT PAYING HIGHER PREMIUMS TO COVER HIGH PERSONAL SELLING COSTS—WITHOUT EXPENSE OF ANY KIND—at the astoundingly low quarterly investment of $4.13 for $1,000.00 of life and $5,000.00 of accident insurance at age 35, with disability benefits and many additional advantages included—premiums for all other ages from 10 to 60 years being in exact proportion as shown below; and you can get as much as $5,000.00 of life, with $25,000.00 of accident protection at this surprisingly small cost of a few pennies a day which will NEVER INCREASE.

Easily—conveniently—privately—WITHOUT MEDICAL EXAMINATION OR AGENTS TO TAKE UP YOUR TIME—you can now secure one of the finest of all life insurance policies—and as soon as you mail the handy coupon printed below, the policy will come to you for your FREE INSPECTION. Not one cent of expense or obligation.

And when you have seen the policy, you are sure to be as enthusiastic about it as Attorney Henry B. Colburn of Cheyenne, Wyo., who says:

"Your policy and plan is evidence to me of capable, conservative management, of the determination of your Company to render the greatest possible return to your patrons, and of the success of your plan to avoid the expense of medical examination and agency costs."

You owe it to yourself to SEE the policy! It's GUARANTEED to please you!—and if it doesn't, for any reason or for NO reason, all you have to do is send the policy back within ten days after you receive it.

Mail the Coupon Today! See for yourself that this is THE policy of ALL policies you should possess! Remember—it will cost you NOTHING if you decide not to keep it!

Important Vitamins in Low-Cost Foods

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

When neither the food supply nor the purse limits the selection of food, it is possible to afford so large a variety that the homemaker may choose somewhat at random within each of the food groups and be reasonably sure of meeting the food requirements of the family. When, as in the drought-affected regions, variety must be greatly curtailed because of food shortage and lack of ready cash, it is necessary to weigh with the utmost care the contributions made by each food material to the dietary. The subcommittee on nutrition, working under the direction of the national drought relief committee, which includes representatives of the cooperative extension service and the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture, has prepared a list of foods that for the money invested in them offer good or excellent returns, in terms of vitamins, protein, and minerals. This list is part of the material assembled to aid professional nutrition workers who are called on to advise families in the sections where one-sided diets are common.

Modern Kitchen Tools Are Necessary

No workman can do good work with poor tools, and many a housewife struggles needlessly with a bulky egg beater, dull or broken knives, or inadequate cooking utensils. A housekeeper of ten years' standing was seen trying to turn fried eggs with a paring knife. When asked why she didn't use a pancake turner, said she'd never owned one. Check over the kitchen equipment and see if some of the dissatisfaction with "kitchen drudgery" may not be remedied by adding a few time and labor saving devices, or by replacing worn-out pieces.

The food groups mentioned by the committee are: Cereals, milk and cheese, eggs, lean meat and fish, fruits and vegetables, sugars, fats. Among the inexpensive protective foods listed, with a rough indication of what each furnishes to the diet, are included: Milk, eggs, lean muscle meat, liver, kidney, fish, shellfish, vegetables, including tomatoes, thin green leafy vegetables, potatoes, and certain root vegetables, dried peas and beans, fruits, whole-wheat products; wheat germ, rice polish, molasses, not highly refined; butter, cod liver oil, pure diet which can be grown on the farm, are recommended in addition to the cereals, fats, and sweet foods on which too many families depend entirely.

AROUND THE HOUSE

Never beat a cake after folding in the egg whites.

A child's honest questions deserve honest answers.

Roll out pastry with light, quick strokes. A heavy hand has ruined many a good pie.

Keep overshoes and raincoats clean and in a cool dark place. Rubber deteriorates rapidly in heat and sunlight.

To loosen dirt and save time and wear in laundering dirty garments, wet them, rub soap on, roll them up, and soak them in a small quantity of water overnight.

After emptying a jar of fruit, wash and dry the jar, put the top on at once, and put the jar on a shelf reserved for the purpose. When canning season arrives next year much trouble in gathering and matching jars and covers will be saved.

Plaids Are in Fashion Limelight

By CHERRIE NICHOLAS

Women who make it a point to declare the new fashions are coming out in frocks of printed silks both the heavier and sheer weaves which play up plaided design in its every mood. In fact, all along the highways and byways which lead through the realm of smart patternings one encounters plaids in some form or another.

The versatility displayed in the new goes to prove that a decided innovation has taken place so far as the new patternings are concerned, in that the gay stripes, plaids and paisleys are a distinct departure from the usual florals which for so long a time have held the center of the stage.

The plaid silk which fashions the modish afternoon dress in the picture is a distinctly conservative at the same time that it is decidedly modern in its technique. The wavy lines which so delicately and gracefully trace a plaid pattern are black against a pale blue background with tiny red dots scattered in pretty confusion throughout the entire design.

Black buttons effectively trim this frock and the color scheme is further stressed in that a black belt, black scarf and black gloves are worn with this costume.

Salsify or Oyster Plant as Winter Food

In the winter months salsify, or as it is often called, oyster plant, appears on our markets. Sometimes a homemaker finds when she has pared and cut her salsify it has turned dark. It is not altered in food value when this happens, but it is not slightly. To avoid difficulty, drop it into cold water as soon as it is cut, says the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture. Salsify is served in a white sauce more often than any other way, but it may also be dipped in flour and fried.

2 bunches salsify or 1 cup milk oyster plant 1/2 tsp. salt
2 lbs. melted butter Pepper or other fat 1 lbs. chopped
1 the flour parsley.

Wash the salsify, scrape, cut into small pieces and drop into cold water to prevent it from turning dark. Boil in an uncovered pan in a small quantity of water for 30 minutes, or until tender, and drain. Prepare a sauce of the fat, flour, milk, salt and pepper, pour this over the cooked salsify, reheat, and serve with the chopped parsley over the top.

Tasty Confection May Be Made of Pumpkin

A delightful confection may be made of 1-inch squares of pared pumpkin. To a pound of these pieces, three-quarters pound of sugar is added, and allowed to stand overnight. In the morning the syrup may be drained off and cooked until it coats the spoon, after which the pumpkin, one lemon, and a tablespoonful of preserved ginger are added, and boiled until the pumpkin is clear. The pumpkin should be simmered until the syrup is absorbed, and then lifted out and drained first on plates, then on a screen covered with cloth. When it is no longer sticky, it is rolled in granulated sugar and packed in glass jars.

Manners of Men

William of Wykeham wrote over the doors of New college, "Manners maketh man." . . . No citizenship can be good in which individuals are not willing to subordinate their own individualities to some extent for the advantage of others. . . . A race or a generation without any concern for good manners would almost certainly in like degree lack unselfishness.—From "Education and Life," by Ernest Martin Hopkins.

Spider's Valuable Secret

Vast engineering schemes at present unthought of would be possible if science could reveal the secret of the spider's web. If man could make ropes and cables with the approximate strength of a spider's web, suspension bridges could be thrown across on small cables, and, being light and easy to anchor, there would be no limit to their length.

Evening Fairy Tale for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

The Fairy Queen took a trip with some of the other fairies to where the banana trees were growing.

The fairies were so tired from the trip that they fell asleep, but just as the Fairy Queen was about to go to sleep she noticed that the leaves of the banana trees all around were laughing, actually laughing.

"What are you laughing for?" asked the Fairy Queen.

"We're laughing because we're almost ripe. It's so jolly to be almost ripe."

"Well, of course, I don't know," said the Fairy Queen. "I've never been a fruit, so I don't know what it would be like to be ripe or unripe."

"Ah, but we have such a glorious time growing, and while we last, we are so happy," the banana trees said.

"Don't you last long?" asked the Fairy Queen. "Of course, I can understand that the bananas wouldn't last long if there were many people around as fond of them as I am.

"I am devoted to bananas. Yes, you really might say that I was devoted to them."

"So are many of us in Fairyland, too, and, of course, in the world of people as well."

The banana leaves laughed again. They made such a lovely sound as they laughed.

It reminded the Fairy Queen of the sound of a gentle summer rain.

"Some of our cousins have traveled on boats," the banana tree said. "Some have gone on trains, too."

"But tell me why you don't last very long?" the Fairy Queen asked.

"Because," said the leaves, "we are cut down when all our fruit has been taken."

"We are not nice any longer. We can never do the same work again, you see."

"But there are shoots that are taken from our roots. These are started off again, and they do the same work as we have done."

"Aren't you sad that you don't do the same work over again yourselves?" asked the Fairy Queen.

"No," said the leaves cheerfully, "it is enough for us to do our work well once."

"What's all we want. That makes us very happy. We love the warm sun and we have had our reward for our work."

"We have grown beautiful and ripe. Ah, ha, ha, we're getting ripe now."

The Fairy Queen's mouth watered and now the other little fairies were waking up.

They were both rested and hungry. Such a banana eating party as they had, and the bananas seemed much pleased in their banana fashion that they were so much liked.

But after it was all over and the eating and the talking was finished, the Fairy Queen went back to Fairyland with the other fairies, and there she told everyone a banana tree history, which they were all so glad to hear.

And she had a big bundle of bananas, too, which the banana trees had sent to Fairyland as their gift.

Recipes That Will Appeal to All

By NELLIE MAXWELL

For a delectable dessert that is not only beautiful to the eye, but satisfying to the palate, try:

Orange Cream.—Soak two tablespoonfuls of gelatin in one-quarter cupful of cold water and dissolve in one-half cupful of hot orange juice, adding one-half cupful of sugar. Fold in one and one-half cupfuls of whipped cream and one-half cupful of orange pulp cut fine. Serve with a fruit syrup.

Tapoca Cream.—Take one-third of a cupful of quick cooking tapioca, add one-half cupful of sugar, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt and one quart of milk. Cook in a double boiler (stirring often) for 15 minutes. Add one egg yolk slightly beaten, one teaspoonful of flavoring and cook for a minute or two, stirring vigorously. Remove from the fire and add the stiffly beaten white of the egg. Chill and serve in glasses with crushed fruit.

Chocolate or caramel sauce or maple syrup with a few chopped nuts may serve for variety in sauces.

Fold whipped cream into the pudding and serve with orange sections or bits of pineapple.

Fold in chocolate sauce mixed with whipped cream. Canned fruit sauce, coconut, marshmallow sauce or canned fruits all make delectable sauces for the pudding.

Club Cookies.—Take one cupful of shortening, one cupful of sugar, one egg, one-half cupful of sour cream, one-half teaspoonful each of soda and cream of tartar and three cupfuls of pastry flour. Mix as usual and pat the dough out to two inches thick and chill overnight. Roll and cut into any desired shape. Bake in a moderate oven ten minutes.

Filling.—Take one cupful of stewed prunes, one-half cupful of stewed apricots, three tablespoonfuls of lemon juice, one-fourth cupful of sugar and one-half cupful of prune or apricot juice. Cook together, adding one tablespoonful each of butter. Cool before using.

Ancient Ophir

Ophir was a seaport or region from which the Hebrews in the time of Solomon obtained gold. The precise geographical situation has long been a subject of doubt and discussion. It was probably in India or perhaps southern Arabia; at any rate, it appears from scriptural mention of the place that it was accessible by water from the towns on the Red sea.

Don't neglect a COLD

Like everything else in the world, a greenhouse is delightful only when there isn't too much of it.—Woman's Home Companion.

Bacon Drippings Add Flavor to Food

Bacon drippings add flavor to every food that is cooked in them, or in which they are used. The drippings are especially good in sauces for meats and vegetables. When added to the dressing for fowl and other meats, a particularly rich flavor is produced.

Use of Chemicals to Remove Stains

There are a few common chemicals which are necessary to remove stains, and these should be kept in every household. Some of them are poisonous, so don't put them in the family medicine cabinet or in the pantry. The chemicals most frequently needed are javelle water, potassium permanganate, oxalic acid, ammonia water, and carbon tetrachloride. Keep these out of reach on a high shelf, together with a medium-sized bowl, a medicine dropper, a glass rod with rounded ends, several pads of cheesecloth or old muslin, a small sponge, and sheets of white blotting paper, suggests the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture.

If the nature of a stain is not known and it does not appear to be greasy, sponging with a wet cloth may be effective. Try this on some part of the garment that will not show, unless you are sure the fabric will not water spot or lose its color. Chemicals should not be used until after water has been tried, except when the fabric is unsuitable for water treatment.

Potassium permanganate can be used in removing certain stains from all white fabrics except rayon. One or more repetitions of the treatment may be necessary in the case of persistent stains. Any pink or brown stain left by the permanganate is removed by applying hydrogen peroxide made very slightly acid, if not already so, with hydrochloric, acetic, oxalic, or tartaric acid. Oxalic acid in saturated solution, or lemon juice, may also be used on cotton, linen, or silk for removing potassium permanganate stains. Follow by thorough rinsing.

Potassium permanganate is suggested for taking out stains made by writing ink, leather, mildew, indelible pencil, perspiration, tea, tobacco, tomato vine, and turmeric, the yellow ingredient in curry powder.

The bottle in which oxalic acid is stored must be marked "Poison" and kept out of reach of children. To prepare a solution, dissolve as many crystals of the acid as possible in a pint of lukewarm water. Put into a bottle, stopper tightly, and use as needed. Apply to the stain with a medicine dropper or glass rod, and after allowing it to remain a few minutes, rinse thoroughly in clean water. Neutralize with a solution of ammonia.

Oxalic acid is mentioned in connection with removing some writing ink stains, iron rust, medicines that contain metallic salts, and some forms of mildew. It is also used after treatment with permanganate, when the latter leaves a residual stain.

Don't neglect a COLD

DISTRESSING cold in chest or throat—that so often leads to something serious—generally responds to good old Musterole with the first application. Should be more effective if used once every hour for five hours.

This famous blend of oil of mustard, camphor, menthol and other helpful ingredients brings relief naturally. Musterole gets action because it is a scientific "counter-irritant"—not just a salve—its penetrates and stimulates blood circulation, helps to draw out infection and pain. Used by millions for 25 years. Recommended by doctors and nurses. Keep Musterole handy—in jars and tubes.

To Mothers—Musterole is also made in milder form for babies and small children. Ask for Child-Size's Musterole.

The SANDMAN STORY

THE VERSE PARTY

OLD WITTY WITCH, and Old Mr. Giant, Billie Brownie, Peter Gnome and many of the others decided to have a verse party.

"A verse party," explained Witty Witch, who was going to have the party at the entrance to her cave, "is a party which might be worse."

"That is, the verses might be worse."

"A Verse Party," Explained Witty Witch.

So don't write your worst verses but next-to-the-worst."

It was very nice to be able to write a next-to-the-worst verse.

That meant they didn't have to apologize for it too much.

They didn't have to say:

"My verse would have been better had I not been rushed at the last moment and so couldn't give it the proper time."

Nor would they have to say:

"I didn't just feel in the poetry mood today. You know some days I feel in it so much more than others."

They didn't have to make any excuses at all.

But there was one rule. And that was that the verses should be about something they'd like to be if they weren't themselves.

It was curious, too, to see, when the verses were being read, that no one really wanted to be anything else.

There is always some reason why no one wants to be someone or something else. You'll find it that way.

Sometimes you will wish you had as much money to spend on toys as another little girl you know, and yet you wouldn't like to change places with her as you wouldn't want her daddy and her mother as you would your own. Maybe, too, her daddy wouldn't let her own a pet dog!

Oh, you'll always find that you've grown so used to being you that you don't really want to wholly change places with anyone.

But of course at the next-to-the-worst verse party they thought of absurd things they might be! That was quite natural. Here are their verses.

This was Witty Witch's verse:

I'd like to be a Rhino,
And live upon the Nile,
But I'd rather not be grumpy
Of such wretched taste and style.

This was Billie Brownie's:
I'd like to be a circus clown,
So folks would laugh at me,
But it wouldn't be so pleasant
If my jokes they couldn't see.

This was Mr. Giant's:
I'd like to be an elephant
With a trunk to swing and sway,
But it wouldn't be so handy
When I went out to play.

This was Peter Gnome's:
I'd like to be a tortoise
And live for years and years,
But I'd rather not be slow
Would cause me to shed tears.

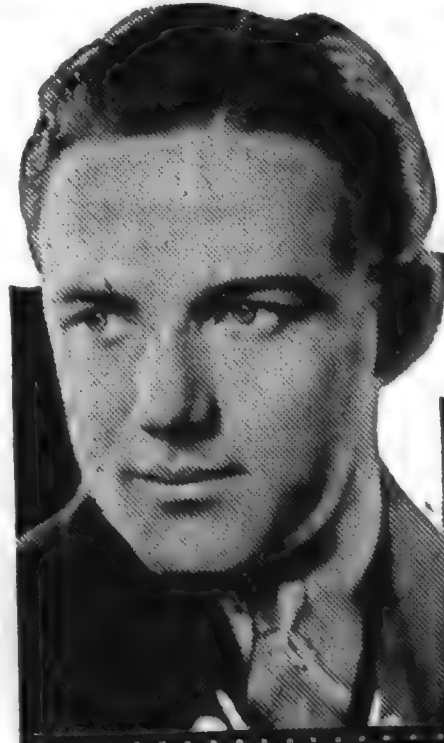

This was Elfin's:
I'd like to be a bow-wow
And have a little tail,
But wagging it so constantly
Would make me tired and pale.

There were more verses and then there was a great banquet of delicious goodies served by Witty Witch, for she said:

"We need strength after all our effort!"

ILLITERACY

ILLITERACY is no longer an individual problem. Its serious effect in the economic and social world is keenly felt. It has become a national problem. Evidence of this fact are apparent in the recent appointment of the secretary of the interior to the churches of America. An earnest request is made for assistance in solving this most aggravating problem. Undoubtedly the churches are in a position to render some real service in this direction in maintaining more efficient instruction classes not only on Sundays, but on the evenings during the week. The infusion of a great moral purpose in the life of our youth will do much to solve this problem, for it is frankly confessed, even by youth itself, that one cannot get very far in this country without an education. The infusion of this high moral purpose also will help to solve our problem of crime, which is attributable to a small part to illiteracy. An official of the American Bankers' association recently remarked in a public address that, "Something like ten billion dollars goes some idea of the tremendous tax which criminals impose on virtually all our people." In this same address he remarked, "The disgraceful carnival of crime is a big job that requires nothing less than the combined forces of business and civic organizations. We must look upon the underworld as another world whose population has more than trebled in the last decade and whose inhabitants present undesirable risks to any legitimate business."

The recent census bureau reports that about 11 per cent of commitments to prisons are from the illiterate class and of the entire population of the United States 4 1/2 per cent are illiterate. The startling fact revealed by this report is that the percentage of illiteracy among the criminal class is about double the percentage of criminals in the entire population.

It is true that illiteracy is on the decline in our country, dropping from 17 per cent of the entire population in 1880 to only 6 per cent in 1920. The cause of illiteracy is more attributable to our lax immigration laws than to any other reason. With our revised laws now in operation governing the admission of immigrants much will be accomplished in reducing the number of those who create the human element in this vexing problem.

LAMBS FATTENED FOR MARKET PAY

Farmers Who Followed the Plan for Years Favor It.

The winter occupation of fattening feeder lambs for the market may or may not be profitable in any one season, but farmers in this section who have followed the industry year after year say the profits from the good years more than balance the deficits incurred in off years, says a writer in the Rural New Yorker. The feeder lamb business is not a sure proposition, but that is true also of any farm industry dairying, crop raising, etc. Market prices cannot be controlled by the average farmer, but as in any branch of farming there are certain rules and principles to be observed in the fattening of feeder lambs.

Extra care must be used the first few days if the industry is to be started properly, without loss of lambs. The bulk of the feeder lambs come from the great sheep ranges in Texas, Arizona, Idaho and Montana. The time taken in transit from these ranges with perhaps one or two lay-overs is productive of a loss of weight of the lambs and the formation of an enormous appetite. Often this ravenous appetite causes the lambs to eat so much grain that it is fatal.

Only light feedings of grain should be given them the first four or five days. Even if the grain portion per lamb is small some of the larger and stronger lambs are very likely to partake of more grain than is safe. Self-feeders should be taboo for the first few days, though being the most practical arrangement to use. Small feedings of grain can be given in the troughs, and as a greater number of lambs can eat from the troughs than two or three self-feeders, the grain is quickly consumed with practically no danger of any lambs overeating.

In feeding forage, not so much caution is required but I would not advise too heavy feedings the first day. The lambs, when they first arrive, are gluttonous, and there might possibly be some ill effects from too much forage. Just enough forage the first day to take the sharpness from their appetite is advisable.

After three or four days, when their craving for grain has been satisfied self-feeders may be used. Even then, there are times that a lamb may overeat, but these instances are few. Some farmers use troughs altogether, but self-feeders make the feeding of grain easier as it entails much less labor. A gradual daily increase in the amount of grain for four or five days should take care of the feeding situation at the start.

When Various Pastures

Are Ready for Animals

Red clover alone or mixed with alfalfa will be ready to pasture in six to twelve months, will furnish pasture for four to five months and will carry ten to twelve hogs per acre.

Sweet clover may be sown alone or with rape or other clovers in March or April. As with alfalfa, it requires a sweet soil. Sweet clover will be ready to pasture some the first year about July 1. The second season it will be ready near the first of April and will furnish pasture for four to six months. About ten to fifteen head of hogs with some cattle may be fed on each acre.

Sudan grass will furnish an abundance of feed in five to seven weeks after sown. It may be sown broadcast or with a drill from May to July 15 at the rate of ten to twenty pounds an acre. It will furnish forage for three to four months and will carry fifteen to twenty head of hogs an acre.

Emergency Pasture for Swine Is Much Favored

An emergency pasture mixture which will give good results for pasturing pigs is made of a mixture of rape, oats and clover, according to W. E. Carroll, University of Illinois. The oats are the first to start and if they are not pastured too heavily will supply feed for some time. The rape is next to reach the grazing stage and will protect the young clover until it is ready to pasture.

Sudan grass last summer provided a good emergency pasture crop, reports. It is rank growing, but seems palatable for pigs if it is not allowed to get too great a start.

With the possibility that clover will be winter killed in many sections of the state it is likely that some kind of emergency pasture crop may be needed in 1921, he states.

Beef Silage Crop

Oats can be used fairly successfully as a silage crop for feeding beef steers. Tests in Illinois showed an average daily gain of 2.88 pounds for steers receiving a ration of shelled corn, cottonseed meal, and alfalfa hay to which was added oat silage. Similar steers receiving the same ration but with corn silage substituted for the oat silage made average daily gains of 3.08. This suggests a possible and profitable use for badly lodged oat crops.

How to Escape FLU

1 Avoid so far as possible the places where flu germs are most likely to be spread; overcrowded cars and public meeting places; overheated, stuffy rooms.

2 Be careful of close contact with others and beware of all coughers and sneezers; breathe through the nose, get fresh air, but avoid drafts or chilling.

3 Get lots of rest. Eat plenty of citrus fruits. Keep the bowels open. Take extra precaution to keep in good physical condition, so your system will have high resistance against germs.

Above all, avoid catching colds. They lower your resistance to the flu germ. Ward them off. At the first sign of any cold, take Bayer Aspirin and remain indoors if possible until your cold is gone. If you have a sore throat, dissolve some Bayer Aspirin tablets in water and gargle; this will relieve the soreness and reduce the inflammation.

4 If you have any reason to suspect even a touch of flu, call your doctor at once.

Quick COMFORT for fretful upset children

ALL children are subject to little upsets. They come at unexpected times. They seem twice as serious in the dead of night. But there's one form of comfort on which a mother can always rely: good old Castoria. This pure vegetable preparation can't harm the tiniest infant. Yet mild as it is, it soothes a restless, fretful baby like nothing else. Its quick relief soon sees the youngster comfortable once more, back to sleep. Even an attack of colic, or diarrhea, yields to the soothing influence of Castoria.

Keep Castoria in mind, and keep a bottle in the house always. Give it to any child whose tongue is coated, or whose breath is bad. Continue with Castoria until the child is grown!

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"NOT FOR JOE"

"Joseph Baxter is my name,
My friends all call me Joe;
I'm up, you know, to every game,
And everything I know,
I once was green as green could be,
I suffered for it though
Now, if they try to on with me
I tell 'em, 'Not for Joe!'"

IT IS almost three-quarters of a century since songs like "Not for Joe" regaled tune-loving audiences. That the song has elements of real public appeal was demonstrated only a few years ago, when Brian Hooker rescored "Not for Joe" among other period songs in his revival of Mrs. Anna Cora Mowatt's play, "Fashion." The music and words of "Not for Joe" are by A. Lloyd, who does not seem to have achieved further fame. But perhaps the authorship of this song alone was considered fame sufficient for one mortal. The '50's were not so exacting. A typical stanza follows:

There's a friend of mine down on Pall Mall,
The other night says: "Joe,
You really ought to know;
She's a widow you should try and win—
"Would a good match be for you,
She's pretty and got lots of tin,
And only forty-two."

Then follows the Chorus, which is quite self-explanatory:

Not for Joe, not for Joe,
If he knows it, not for Joseph,
No, no, no, not for Joe,
Not for Joseph, oh, dear, no!

THE WHY OF SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

CORN COB OVER THE DOOR

HERE is another way in which a young woman may divine the person whom she is destined to marry. It is especially adapted for marriageable girls in the rural districts where, indeed, the superstition most prevails. Take an ear of corn and shell off all but twenty of the kernels. Then hang man who enters under it will marry you.

In this we have arithmancy, sun-worship and that form of nature worship which applied to the grain-spirit, in the form of a survival. The ancients, it is true, did not have Indian corn; but they had wheat, which is corn everywhere but in America, and there were grains in the "ear" of wheat. The grain-spirit is equally represented by maize of other forms of corn. The cult of the grain-spirit was universal among primitive man. It lingers in many modern superstitions and, first and last, volumes have been written about it. Hanging the corn cob over the door invokes the grain-spirit. By leaving twenty grains on the cob the sun god is also invoked, for according to the arithmancy of the Babylonians, twenty represented the sun. They gave numbers to all their gods, placing the sun, moon and stars in which they called the "secundus" and assigning them the numbers twenty, fifty and forty respectively. And Babylonian arithmancy came down to the western world through the Greeks and the Romans.

Snake-Skin Trade Boosted

Taking advantage of the demand in America for snake and alligator skins for women's shoes, purses and other articles, Venezuela is boosting its possibilities in large quantities. If snakes are wanted large quantities of these huge non-poisonous specimens are waiting for hunters in the interior, declares the report.

Prosperous Weaving Mill

Barley, a remote village in north-east Lancashire, England, is in the limelight as the one bright spot in the depressed Lancashire cotton industry. By the side of a rippling brook and overshadowed by the majestic bulk of Pendle hill is a tiny mill which can secure orders against foreign competition. This mill can weave fabrics as flawless as much larger mills with the latest of machinery. It has never known a stoppage, except on holidays, during the last 15 years. And not one of the weavers has ever drawn a penny in unemployment benefit.

The Bogy and Bob

By BLANCHE NAYLOR

(Copyright.)

EVELYN BURT tied a big bow of yellow tulle on the handle of a basket of blue larkspur and placed it in the window of Ye Flower Shoppe. As she did so, she looked straight into the eyes of Glenn Mowbray, who was admiring the picture she made with her yellow hair and Alice blue gown and the basket in her hand.

Caught red-handed in the act Mowbray had the grace to enter and purchase the blossoms included in his stare.

"What name, please?" asked Evelyn in her best business manner, although her cheeks were pink from the bold admiration in the face of the customer.

"Oh, Spring, or Flora, or Raphael's Flower Girl, any would be appropriate," he offered.

"I beg your pardon, to whom do you wish the basket sent?"

"Oh, send it to the hospital or to a sick friend or anyone you wish. I just bought it because it was a part of a beautiful picture," Glenn Mowbray declared.

"Your card?" Evelyn inquired.

"Anonymous," he smiled, "although my name is Glenn Mowbray. Is yours by any chance Juno or Helen or Clytie?"

Evelyn ignored the question.

"Five dollars," she murmured.

"And cheap at the price," he rejoined placing the bill in her outstretched palm.

THE COMMUNITY AND ITS BANKS

By ROME C. STEPHENSON

President American Bankers Association

While upon the individual bankers there rests without qualification the direct responsibility for the prudent, honest conduct of their institutions, nevertheless the soundness of banking as a practical matter is a community problem in which the public has a part to play as well as bankers and government officials charged with the supervision of banks.

In the first place, the assets of a bank, outside its government bonds, consist mainly of loans to business men and of investments in securities created by corporate enterprises. The deposits of a bank are not kept in the vaults as idle cash but are employed in these loans and investments to earn the money to pay the expenses of the bank so that it can render service to its customers and also pay them interest on such deposits as bear interest. If there were no such thing as unsound business men or enterprises there would be no such thing as unsound assets in a bank.

It is of course the unquestioned duty of the banker to choose only sound loans and investments, but the difficulty of such judgment, and human judgment is never infallible, is plainly increased in such times and under such conditions as we have been passing through, with many businesses not making expected earnings and therefore hampered in meeting their obligations. Unfortunately some investments and loans created by persons outside the banks which found their way into the banks in a relatively few instances have reflected the unwise business policies and conditions that became more than usually prevalent in our business activities and contributed to the difficulty of banking. The vast bulk of bank assets, however, are 100 per cent sound above all question.

"Hard Boiled" vs. "Easy" Banker

In another aspect the people of the community have a part to play in maintaining the soundness of their banks, and that is through the medium of patronage. The existence of a bank is dependent on public patronage. If only those banks were patronized in which the most careful policies were practiced and the most conscientious and able men in charge, it would go far toward maintaining the standards of banking. If business men in a community when refused loans by their banks for good and sufficient reasons because conditions are not favorable, thereupon withdraw their business to banks where less careful methods prevail, they clearly contribute to the creation of a less sound banking situation.

Also if, in the heat of competition, a banker offers higher interest rates or more free service to attract customers than the earnings of conservative banking justify, and is encouraged by the patronage of the public as against a more conservative bank, obviously the public is again playing a part in bringing about a less sound banking situation. It is an unfortunate fact that the banker who is strict, "hard boiled" if you please, is liable to be less popular than the "easy" banker, and by that same token the public itself has a voice in influencing the character of banking. Also it is the public in the end which pays the main part of the penalty if unfortunate results follow.

Still again the public can exert an influence in shaping the character of banking by supporting the purposes of bankers to maintain intelligent, independent, honest banking supervision by the public banking departments through insisting that this function of government shall be kept as free from political influence as the judiciary itself and shall be manned only by men of the highest ability and character.

In still another way can the people themselves contribute to maintaining the ability of their banks to meet their obligations, and this is by granting them the fullest possible confidence. As I said, the deposits are not kept as cash but are invested in loans and securities. Even the soundest assets of this type require some time to convert at full value into cash deposits. In many cases of bank troubles the only thing wrong with a bank was an unduly suspicious and apprehensive state of mind in its customers created by no act or condition of its own but by baseless rumors which sometimes led them to destroy the value of their own deposits by demanding them immediately, forcing a bank to sacrifice its assets and otherwise disrupt its financial operations.

St. Joe-Spencerville Road Sells to Columbia City Bidder

THERE WERE EIGHTEEN CONTRACTORS AT AUBURN TUESDAY TO SUBMIT THEIR BIDS FOR THIS ROAD—A VERY DESIRABLE CONTRACT.

Much interest and enthusiasm has been manifested in the paving program of DeKalb County, and when the proposals were opened Tuesday morning by the county commissioners, it was found that the Tri Lakes Construction Co. of Columbia City, was low for the St. Joe-Spencerville paved road with a bid of $94,553.29 and that Ray L. Harris of Fort Wayne, with a bid of $51,430.90, was low for the paving of the Waterloo-Hamilton road.

Due to the large number of contractors present at the telling Tuesday, and the many interested people of the county, it was found necessary to take the session to the assembly room of the court house.

The low bid for the Alvin Steckley gravel road in Wilmington township, $5,748.20, was submitted by Sparling & May of Ft. Wayne.

The board Tuesday afternoon let the contracts to the three low bidders.

Other bids were received as follows:

St. Joe-Spencerville Road
Tri Lakes Con. Co., Columbia City, .....	$ 94,553.29
Grace Construction Co., Ft. Wayne, .....	$102,415.21

Steckley Road
Sparling & May, Fort Wayne, .....	$5,748.20
Rosenberry & Gunsaulus, Butler, .....	$5,940.00
Betts & Essinger, Columbia City, .....	$5,997.69
Forder & Davis, Hicksville, .....	$6,085.64
Baker & Dunn, St. Joe, .....	$6,301.33

The estimates by the county surveyor follow: St. Joe-Spencerville road, $130,779.51; Waterloo-Hamilton road, $63,735.05;

Steckley road, $7,440.60. The St. Joe-Spencerville road will be all of concrete, 5.2 miles in length. The Waterloo-Hamilton road will start at its intersection with U. S. No. 27. The first 1 1/2 miles will be of concrete and the next 2 1/4 miles of bituminous retread. The Steckley road is two miles in length.

Two petitions have been filed with the board of Commissioners, one for the St. Joe-Spencerville road and the other for the Waterloo-Hamilton road, praying that the board grant state inspection of the construction of these two hard-surfaced highways.

The petitioners feel that it will be to the interest of the taxpayers to ask for such inspection, and that the cost of construction is of such amount that we want the best possible road for the money.

If in the future that this road is completed from Leo to the County Line, and from St. Joe on north to Butler, joining State Road No. 6, and is constructed under the inspection of our State Highway Department, it will be an easier project to have the state take over, and mark as one of their road systems, thus barring any future objections as to not being constructed according to their plans.

The plans, as you are well aware of, were drawn by Chas. T. Miser, then county surveyor, and the inspection passed the commission as 100%, which speaks well for the work thus far.

The next move on the part of the county commissioners will be to sell the bonds for these projects and then work will be ready to go.

Watch The News columns for information as to the progress of the work.

On next Monday night, the 9th, the local eliminating contest will be held in the community gym.

CANCER FATAL TO AUBURN RESIDENT

Funeral services for John Simanton, a well known DeKalb county resident, were held from the late home at 1301 South Main street, Auburn, Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock. Rev. Fred Thomas, was the officiating minister and burial was made in Woodlawn cemetery.

Mr. Simanton, who was in his sixty-eighth year, had been suffering with cancer of the stomach for four years and had been bedfast since the holidays. At the time of Mrs. Simanton's death last January 26th his death was expected hourly. He succumbed to the dread disease Sunday morning at 10 o'clock.

The deceased was born in Concord township August 27, 1862, the son of William and Barbara Simanton. He next moved to a farm near St. Joe, where he was united in marriage to Alice Wilderson Simanton. They moved from the farm to Auburn thirteen years ago, where he has since lived a retired life.

Surviving is a foster daughter, Mrs. John Engle of St. Joe.

COUNTRY FIRE EARLY TUESDAY MORNING

The Keener residence, one mile east of the Hadsell bridge, occupied by Estel Coburn and family, caught on fire early Tuesday morning, shortly after Mr. Coburn had left for his work at Garrett.

Mrs. Coburn had started a fire in the parlor stove and had started to write a letter to her sister, hearing some cracking noise she investigated and discovered the attic on fire. She ran up stairs and got the two children out of bed, spread the alarm by phone, called the St. Joe Fire Department and then took the children to the Wilson Beaser home for safety.

By this time some of the neighbors came and proceeded to move out the household goods, the fire department arrived in no time, and by the time a tank of chemicals was consumed the fire was licked.

The house is roofed and sided with asphalt shingles and the fire could not get its breath, hence it burned slowly.

The damage will be considerable, due to smoke and water. Rather an amusing incident took place when the department was giving the alarm at St. Joe. A traveler had put up for the night at the hall and some of his clothing was hanging on the rear of the truck. When the boys pulled out they knew nothing of this, and the fellow was excited and supposed he had his clothes all on, but a hat was found at the railroad crossing and on the Hadsell.

FILE MORTGAGE EXEMPTIONS NOW

Mortgage exemptions may be filed beginning Monday, this week, and extending to Monday, May 4, and soldiers' exemptions until May 1.

The law provides that an owner of real estate having a mortgage on his property can by filing a certified statement obtain a credit not to exceed one-half the assessed valuation, or more than $1,000, if the indebtedness existed prior to March 1 of the present year.

Hundreds of DeKalb county real estate owners take advantage of this law and in most cases the exemption is the maximum allowed. The description of the property, the name of the holder of the mortgage and its amount must be set out in the blank and the instrument must be sworn to before a notary public.

The law also provides that any soldier or sailor who served three months or more in the army or navy of the United States during the Civil or Mexican War, and who shall have reached the age of sev-

Good Things for the Table

By NELLIE MAXWELL

"When one grows up with the mountains, rather than molehills against which to measure one's self, one's importance becomes amusingly small."

With the children the real party begins when the refreshments are served, and as we are all "children of a larger growth," we may be excused for liking tasty, nice refreshments.

For a bridge party the decorations may be in the color and design of the four suits of cards.

Canned pimientos may be cut in the form of diamonds or hearts to top an open or double sandwich, spread with cream cheese. For clubs and spades, raisins or prunes or dates may be used.

All Trump Sandwiches.—Cut thin slices of bread into oblongs to resemble playing cards. Spread lightly with softened butter and then with cream cheese which has been rubbed to a paste with cream. Make the spots on the cards, the red of pimiento and the black of stuffed dates cut into slices.

Grand Siam Salad.—Dissolve one envelope of gelatin in one cupful of boiling water. Drain a number two can of grapefruit and add it (one cupful of the juice). Add a few drops of coloring and enough after-dinner mints to flavor the mixture delicately. Two dozen will be ample. When the jelly is of the consistency of egg white, fold in the grapefruit sections cut into halves with the scissors, one cupful of diced cucumber and pour into small molds. Surround when serving with water cream and serve with sour cream or cream or cream cheese dressing.

American Chop Suey.—Brown two sliced onions in two tablespoonfuls of fat, add one-half pound of fresh pork cut into strips, one green pepper shredded, one-half cupful of mushrooms sliced, one cupful of shredded celery. Cook one-fourth of a cupful of rice in three cupfuls of stock with one teaspoonful of salt, adding all the other ingredients. Serve with buttered rice crispies, pouring the chop suey over them.

Chicken Ham or Croquettes.—Put one small sliced onion and two sprigs of parsley through the food chopper with two and one-half cupfuls of ham or chicken, add one cupful of rolled crackers and mix well. Add a beaten egg, three-fourths of a cupful of milk and two tablespoonfuls of cooking oil. Season to taste with salt and pepper and shape, roll in cracker crumbs, then in egg beaten with one-fourth of a cupful of milk, then in crumbs again and fry in deep fat after chilling well. The fat should be hot enough to brown a cube of bread in 40 seconds, or 385 degrees Fahrenheit.

Did you ever use orange juice and some of the rind in a lemon pie? If not try it the very next time you make a lemon pie.

Wise Potato Bugs

Potato bugs that spend the winter underground take "anti-freeze" precautions by getting rid of one-third their weight in water, which otherwise would freeze and burst the body cells.

Read Labels on Bottles Before Buying

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

When you go into a grocery store to buy the family goods, do you read carefully the labels on the bottles or packages you select? Do you trust to your eyes in estimating the quantity in each container, or do you find out from the label exactly what you are getting for your money? Do you compare articles of one brand with those of another, both in quantity and quality? Do you observe whether or not the label declares artificial coloring or flavoring?

Labels must tell truthfully what kind of material a package, bottle, or can of food contains, and what quantity. The statement on the label should not be misleading in any way to the consumer. Sometimes, however, it may be truthful and still misleading. Again, the appearance of the container may be misleading, and if the statement on the label is overlooked, the buyer gets poor value.

The food and drug administration of the United States Department of Agriculture urges every housewife to scrutinize the labels on every kind of food she buys, as well as on the drugs she needs in her household. In the case of foods, it has been found that most manufacturers and packers have shown a satisfactory disposition to meet the demands for truthful labeling, but occasionally it is evident that there is some attempt to give the consumer less value than she thinks she is getting.

Take the two bottles illustrated. Bottles of peculiar shape, with thick sides and bottoms, like the taller of these two, sometimes hold less than those which are made in an ordinary very slowly, the shrinkage of the meat when rare is only about one-eighth of the fresh weight; whereas if the roasting goes on to the end in a hot oven the shrinkage is about one-fourth of the fresh weight.

Well-done beef shrinks more than rare beef, other things being equal. Well-finished, high-grade beef and lamb roasts lose more fat and less water during cooking than very thin meat of the same kind and cut.

Consider the Shrinkage When Cooking Roasts

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

When a housewife cooks a rib roast of beef or a leg of lamb she must consider how much loss there is likely to be from shrinkage. Naturally she wants the meat to "go as far" as possible. Dietitians in schools, hospitals, and other institutions have the same problem on a larger scale; they must be able to estimate both the number of servings and also the nutritive value of each serving. Shrinkage of meat during cooking means a dollars and cents loss to the manager of a restaurant, cafeteria, or hotel dining room, or to a delicatessen where cooked meat is sold. The shrinkage affects the appearance, palatability and nutritive value.

In the last four years the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture has been accumulating meat-shrinkage data in connection with the nation-wide cooperative study of the factors that influence the palatability of meat. There seems to be a close relation between shrinkage and oven temperature; that is, when meat is roasted from start to finish in a very hot oven the shrinkage is greater than when the meat is first served at a high temperature and then finished slowly with the temperature rapidly reduced. For example, if, after beef ribs have been seared in a hot oven, the temperature is rapidly reduced so as to finish the cooking

PORK SHOULD BE COOKED WELL-DONE

Use a Thermometer to Insure Well-Done Roast Pork.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

As in cooking other roast meats, the use of a thermometer when roasting a fresh ham removes the guesswork. This is particularly important in the case of pork, which should always be served well-done. Thorough cooking is necessary, because pork sometimes contains the trichina parasite, which, if not destroyed, may cause illness. Since this organism is killed when heated to 137 degrees Fahrenheit, there is ample margin of safety when pork is cooked to the well-done stage, 182 degrees Fahrenheit.

The following directions for cooking a fresh ham are given by the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture:

Wipe the ham with a damp cloth and leave the rind on. The ham will cook more quickly and shrink less when the rind is not removed. Sprinkle the surface of the meat with salt and pepper and rub with flour. Place the ham, rind side up, on a rack in an open roasting pan, without water. Make a small incision through the rind with a sharp knife or steel skewer, cut short gashes around it with scissors, and insert a roast-meat thermometer through the opening so that its bulb reaches the center of the fleshiest portion of the ham.

Place the pan containing the ham in a hot oven (480 degrees Fahrenheit) and sear for about 20 minutes.

Then reduce the oven temperature rapidly to very moderate heat (300 degrees to 325 degrees) and continue the cooking at this temperature until the roast meat thermometer in the ham registers 182 degrees. Between 25 and 30 minutes per pound will probably be required when these oven temperatures are used. Do not add water and do not cover the meat during the roasting.

When the ham is done remove it from the oven and carefully take off the rind. To remove the rind easily break through it on the fleshy side at the hock, then turn the ham over and lift the rind off in one piece. With a sharp knife score the fat covering in squares. Stick long-stemmed cloves into the intersections and sprinkle brown sugar over the fat surface. Return to a moderately hot oven (375 degrees Fahrenheit) to brown over the top. Serve hot or cold.

Savory Brown Gravy

Remove excess fat from the pan drippings. Mix two tablespoonfuls of flour with the drippings remaining in the pan, add one and one-half to two cupfuls of cold water and cook until smooth. If the pan drippings are strong in flavor, add more water, and flour in proportion. Cook one-half cupful of chopped parsley or celery leaves and one tablespoonful of chopped onion in a small quantity of the fat and add to the gravy.

Bottles of Peculiar Shape.

shape, like the one that seems at first glance smaller. In this instance, the fancy shaped bottle held only one fluid ounce, and the straight-sided bottle held two fluid ounces.

Bedtime Story for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

"I'm sorry," said young Edgar Eagle, "to be late at the party, but I'm glad I can stay later."

He enjoyed the party immensely—it was being given for a young eagle of two years of age.

His mother had a fine white head and tail, and the young eagle was looking forward to the day when he would be bald—or rather that is what they call it.

A bald eagle is not really bald, and when that word is used it means that the eagle has white feathers on his head.

The young eagle would have a white tall and white feathers on his head in one more year—when he would be three years of age.

But now the party was over and young Edgar Eagle was talking to the birthday eagle.

"What a fine white head and tail you have," said the two-year-old eagle to Edgar Eagle.

"Yes," said young Edgar Eagle, "I am three years old. But we must be friends, and we will be friends."

"Good," said the young eagle. He was very proud to have a friend a whole year older than himself.

"Do you know," said young Edgar Eagle, "that we are very much honored?"

"Lots, and lots, and lots of people, who call themselves 'Americans' have taken our family for their emblem."

"What's an emblem?" asked the two-year-old eagle.

"It means," said young Edgar Eagle, "that they wish to be like us."

"They want to be free and brave and independent. And it's very fine

"You know, too, that our pictures are all over the world, and as they call us such fine names we surely, surely, must live up to them."

"Yes, indeed," said the two-year-old eagle, "but can't we have an extra piece of left-over birthday cake first, before we start off on our lessons in how to be so very strong?"

"How to be so very strong?" said Edgar Eagle.

So off went young Edgar Eagle and the two-year-old eagle, and they had many flying adventures.

Edgar taught him splendid lessons about flying and it certainly was fine for the young eagle to have such a superior and wise eagle teacher.

Just think, he was being so friendly and he was a whole year older and was really a full-grown eagle.

Harvard Beets Tasty, Colorful, Attractive

"Sweet-sour" beets, they are sometimes called. Harvard beets are not only tasty but colorful and attractive to look at, and because of the vinegar used in the sauce, they take the place of a relish. The bureau of home economics tells how to make them.

6 medium-sized beets 1/4 cup salt 1/4 cup sugar 1 tsp. cornstarch 1/2 cup vinegar 2 tbs. butter or other fat

Wash the beets, cook them in boiling water until tender, remove the skins, and cut the beets into thin slices or cubes. Mix the sugar and the cornstarch and salt. Add the vinegar and let the sauce boil for five minutes, stirring constantly. Add the fat. Pour the sauce over the beets. Let them stand for a few minutes to absorb the sweet-sour flavor of the sauce. For variety two tablespoonfuls freshly grated horseradish may be added just before serving.

The copperhead and the highland, moccasin are the same species of snake. The water moccasin is a different species. These snakes are frequently called cottonmouth snakes from their habit of opening their mouths wide in a threatening manner and exposing the whitish inner parts.

First Name for Matches

Matches were formerly called congraves in Sweden, France and Germany because the progenitor of the modern match, a friction light device in 1827 by John Walker, was named by him after Sir William Congreve, an English artillery officer, who had invented the life-saving rocket.

Bolero Suit With Frilly Blouse

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Comes as a most welcome fashion for spring, the bolero suit with a frilly blouse. Every woman who is wise as to what's flattering, knows that among costumes youthful there is none more so than the skirt-and-bolero type with which is worn a "fussy," frilly, utterly feminine blouse.

With this charming fashion foremost on the style program, there is every prospect that its vogue will be widespread during the coming months. You can see for yourself, from this picture how attractive the threesome of a plated skirt, a bolero and a frilly-looking blouse can be, especially when the latter is elaborated with myriads of tiny lace edgings sewed row-and-row, as it is in this instance.

It is really a matter of choice as to whether the skirt and the wee jacket be made of fat crepe or a sheer woolen weave for Dame Fashion says either. Then there is the question of color. With black taken as a matter of course the next move is navy, for the consensus of opinion is that it is going to be a season of "blues." Others there are who declare that brown for this spring is "it."

Later on in the season these youthful bolero suits on the order of the model illustrated will appear in the most delectable pastel tones, their platelets greens, pale grays, blues and pinks being so alluring we will be falling in love all over again with this fetching mode.

Such a blouse season as this promises to be. We have not witnessed the like for years. It simply had to be, this vogue for the blouse, what with short-jacket suits being the rage. The story of the blouse and its endless program as outlined for spring and summer, is a volume in itself. Touching merely on the highspots which relate to the new blouse types, the first thought which comes to mind is the popularity of plaids, stripes and prints for its making.

Then, too, there is every reason to believe that the salty, frilly, lingerie blouse will return. The fact of the

ABOUT BOB WHITE

THE hunter who had shot one of Bob White's children chuckled gleefully as he went forward to pick up the poor little brown bird. He was having what he called sport. It never entered his head to think of how the Bob Whites must feel. He probably didn't think they had any feelings. He was pleased that he had made a successful shot and he was pleased to think that he was to have that little brown bird to eat, thought of course he didn't need it the least bit in the world, having plenty of other things to eat.

"Must Be I Just Wounded Him," Said He.

But when he reached the place where he had seen little Bob White fall there was no little brown bird there. No, sir, there was not a sign of that little bird save a few feathers. You see he hadn't killed the little Bob White as he had supposed, but had broken a wing so that it could not fly. But there was nothing the matter with its legs and no sooner had it hit the ground than it had run as fast as ever it could through the stubble. So the little Bob White wasn't where the hunter was looking for him at all. Of course his dog helped him hunt and with that wonderful nose of his he soon found the scent of that little Bob White and eagerly followed it. It just happened that in that field near where the little Bob-White fell was an old home of Johnny Chuck's and all around the entrance to it the sand had been spread out. Now sand does not hold scent. The little Bob White knew nothing about that for he had not lived long enough to learn all that a Bob White has to learn, but he did see the open doorway. Across the yellow sand he ran and into the doorway and just a little way down the hall, where he hid under some dry brown leaves which had blown in there. He was almost the color of them himself as he squatted close to the ground and drew his feathers as close to his body as possible. In doing this he was doing a very wise thing, though he didn't know it at the time. You see his feathers drawn tightly against his body that way prevented the scent which might have told the keen nose of that dog where he was.

As it was the dog lost the scent at the edge of the sand and neither he nor the hunter once thought to look in that old hole. So while they hunted the little Bob White squatted perfectly still, though his broken wing hurt him dreadfully, and the ache of it made his eyes fill with tears. At last the hunter gave up the search. He was too impatient to kill more.

"Must be I just wounded him," said he, without one thought of how dreadful it must be to be wounded. "Probably a fox will get him. But I kill the next one."

With that he sent his dog on to try to find the little Bob White's brothers and sisters, his terrible gun held ready to shoot the instant he should see one of them. He was having great sport, was that hunter, while in the hall of Johnny Chuck's old home lay a little brown Bob White faint with suffering and dreadful fright.

"TO MAKE THE NIGHT HIDEOUS"

WE HAVE all heard or read this phrase which is practically always associated, and correctly so, with sleep which is disturbed by the revels of those who, by their howling, boisterousness and other noises, make slumber impossible.

While this phrase seems apt enough to be modern, we owe it, in fact, to no less a person than our own Will Shakespeare, in whose work, "Hamlet," we find what is probably its earliest recorded use in the sense indicated.

THE WHY OF SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

BABY'S TOOTH

ALL old-time nurses and mothers careful when a child lost its first milk tooth that the tooth should be burned in the fire; for if it were thrown away and a dog happened to get hold of it the child would have a "dog's tooth" grow in its place when the new teeth came. Inquiry reveals this superstition to still be surprisingly common even among people who ought to know better. But its absurdity is equaled by its antiquity and our barbarian ancestors regarded it as a perfectly reasonable proposition.

It works by "contagious magic" upon the principle that has been a part of a man's retina, though, disavowed by his reason and sympathy severed from him, a magical sympathy with his person and what happens to it will happen to him. This is especially true of teeth, the hardest and most indestructible part of a man. Young children were always regarded as being particularly susceptible to magical influences of all sorts. Therefore if a dog gnaws the cast milk tooth of a child a contagion is set up and the tooth which grows in its place is a "dog-tooth." Many an old woman can point to a "dog-toothed" neighbor as proof of this. The superstition appears to be universal and in some countries the cast milk teeth are deliberately placed where rats can get at them in the belief that if they do the child's new teeth will be as strong and sharp as the rodent's.

The Old Gardener Says:

MANY climbing roses thrive when grown on their own roots, and can be propagated readily from cuttings. This is such a simple plan that any garden maker can increase his stock if he has a single plant. Dorothy Perkins can be multiplied easily by laying down the canes that are near the ground and covering them with a little soil. This plan may be followed with other free growing kinds but with most varieties it is better to make cuttings—short sturdy pieces of half ripened wood, cut off just below a joint and inserted three-quarters of their depth in sand or sandy soil in a sheltered position.

BENEFITS OF DEPRESSION

THE year 1930 will go down in history as witnessing one of the most severe depressions the economic world has ever experienced. Many experts are trying to explain how it all happened. Most interesting writing this, but of little value unless this review of the tragic past keeps us from making the same mistakes again. Nothing is gained by crying over spilled milk. To brood over past mistakes is only misdirected energy. To determine not to commit the same mistakes is a most valuable resolution. One writer remarked: "People have been treated to a cold shower and have been sobered up." This sobering process, however, is not without its valuable benefits. One benefit is that we have seen the value of a reserve.

Many large corporations were able to stem the tide of depression because of their strong cash reserves. They had millions of dollars in cold cash in the banks. Had it been otherwise the hard times might have been much worse. The tendency of the American people to spend extravagantly and fall to create a cash reserve has certainly been appalling. It was not surprising that tourists from Europe stood aghast at the way money was squandered in America. Conditions have changed and while commodity prices are lower and the purchasing power of the dollar increased, the majority are more cautious and less extravagant. We have come to see the folly of installment buying, and will learn to be more content with necessities and less ambitious for useless luxuries. Economically, we have been "sobered up."

The period of depression has also emphasized the solidarity of the race. The idea that one can live in a sort of vacuum has been exploded. Everybody—the rich and poor—all felt the impact of the depression. Corporations facing the possibility of wage reductions and dismissal of wage earners also faced their dependence upon labor. Some still boast that they did not discharge a man. "They are now thinking and studying for which they did not have time in busy years." In the trial and suffering of the period of depression all in some measure shared a common problem and many, in liberal contributions, helped to meet the sorrow of that problem. Socially we have been "sobered up." Perhaps we are now ready to avoid those defects in our economic system which periodically "paralyze business and deprive millions of men of their natural right to earn a living."

FARM STOCK

TELLING AGES OF SHEEP IS KNACK

Many Beginners Do Not Know How.

Ewes have been good property lately. This has prompted newcomers to enter the business. A good many of them may not know how to "mouth" a sheep. The old and accepted way to mouth a sheep has been described a hundred times and then some. It is good so far as it goes, but when it goes no further than about five-year-olds the green hand with sheep is up against it. The ages offered for sale often give the beginner small chance to practice the usual craft of monthing sheep.

A pair of large cutting teeth in the middle (below of course) mean the animal is a year old and under two. Four teeth there mean a two-year-old and under three—and so on. The age may vary a little in months, but this is of no consequence to the farmer. The snag comes when the ewe shows "a full mouth," which puts the monthing man on his own resources for age beyond five years.

After that the gums begin to shrink away from the crown of the tooth, making it appear long from cutting edge to gums. If the gums do not come up snugly to the crown of the tooth, then you have an aging ewe. If the "neck" of the tooth is long from the crown to the gums your ewe has seen her best days. If the teeth have begun to break, anybody knows that means old age and a very sensible excuse for offering her for sale.

Milk Goats Worthwhile and Quite Profitable

Among worthwhile and profitable pets the milk goat stands high. The goat is one pet that pays its board bill.

The ordinary scrub milk goat costs ten to twenty-five dollars and gives about a half-gallon of milk daily when well fed. She usually freshens about the first of the year and often has twin kids. As for feed, the proverbial tin can ration is a hoax. She must be fed quite like a cow, and her feed must be ample if she is milking heavily. Goats can be fed all of the usual grains and they can be trained to eat other products as well. In a series of experiments at the college one group was reared on hay, fish meal, and oats. Another group was fed ground liver.

Goat's milk is white and buttery, and from it is white. The fat in goat's milk is in such small particles that the cream rises slowly, and it takes several days in the ice chest before a thick cream layer is formed. The fat content is about the same as that of a Jersey cow, although it varies widely with individual animals. The market for goat's milk is usually localized. It is usually developed by the initiative of the owner who sells milk to a local hospital, sanitarium, or to special customers.

Cheap Hog Grain

Wheat is a cheaper grain for hogs at present than corn and has given excellent results in many experiments this year and in former years. The wheat is ground coarsely and fed in a self-feeder. A mixture of two parts tankage and one of linseed is used as supplement with splendid results. For mineral with this ration one may be able to use a home-made mixture of two parts limestone, two parts bone meal and one of salt. The commercial minerals will serve well.

Live Stock Notes

Red canary grass pasture will not cause animals to bleed.

There is nothing as good to feed sheep as good, bright alfalfa hay.

Recent tests in Indiana indicate that good heavy oats are equal in value to corn for fattening western lambs.

Care should be exercised in selecting that the horse also gets all the salt he cares to eat and that he is well supplied with plenty of water of good quality.

The production of beef cattle in the United States is important not only in our agriculture but also in the agriculture of the world.

Most of the cattle fattened in the corn belt area are bought in the fall as two-year-olds from the western range.

Selling direct to a speculator or packer buyer in the country and shipping direct to the packing house appeals to some producers on account of the elimination of stock yard charges.

Castoria made especially for CHILDREN

CHILDREN usually hate to take medicine but every child loves the taste of Castoria. And mothers like its action—so gentle, yet so prompt and effective.

Castoria is a never-failing comfort to children and mothers alike because it was formulated expressly for children—to correct their little ills and upsets.

The beauty of it is you can give Castoria to children of all ages with equally sure results. When baby's cry warns of colic, a few drops of Castoria has him soothed; and free from pain, he is asleep again in a jiffy.

In an older child when coated tongue or bad breath tell of constipation, a more liberal dose is usually all that is needed to cleanse and regulate the bowels.

Your doctor will tell you Castoria deserves a place in the family medicine cabinet until your children are grown. He knows it is safe for the tiniest baby; effective for a child in his teens.

How to Escape FLU

1 Avoid so far as possible the places where flu germs are most likely to be spread; overcrowded cars and public meeting places; overheated, stuffy rooms.

2 Be careful of close contact with others and beware of all coughers and sneezers; breathe through the nose, get fresh air, but avoid drafts or chilling.

3 Get lots of rest. Eat plenty of citrus fruits. Keep the bowels open. Take extra precaution to keep in good physical condition, so your system will have high resistance against germs.

4 Above all, avoid catching colds. They lower your resistance to the flu germ. Ward them off. At the first sign of any cold, take Bayer Aspirin and remain indoors if possible until your cold is gone. If you have a sore throat, dissolve some Bayer Aspirin tablets in water and gargle; this will relieve the soreness and reduce the inflammation.

5 If you have any reason to suspect even a touch of flu, call your doctor at once.

OBITUARY

Carol Louise, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lee Chapman was born at Spencerville, Indiana, August 4, 1930, and departed this life February 23, 1931 at the age of six months and nineteen days.

On last Thursday evening Little Carol was stricken with pneumonia and the last few days of her brief life were filled with intense suffering.

In the Lord's garden she was only a bud. She was taken before the flower was unfolded. But the bud thus crushed was transplanted into the garden in heaven where it will unfold in all its beauty.

Surviving besides the parents are three brothers, Willard, of Dayton, Ohio; Lee Jr. and William at home, and the two sisters, Lucille and Doris Jean at home, and the grandparents of Fort Wayne.

The funeral was held from the Lutheran Church, Wednesday afternoon at 2:30, conducted by Rev. Stoll, with burial in White City Cemetery.

CARD OF THANKS

We thank our many friends for the assistance and sympathy, during our bereavement. Lee Chapman, Wife and Children.

NOW IS THE TIME TO STEP ON THE GAS

When one is out motoring and comes to a steep hill, one does not shut off the gas and expect the car to climb the steep incline on the same power that was required to propel it along the level road.

Quite the contrary is true. In every instance of this kind the driver "steps on the gas," as we say, and furnishes the motor with the extra power required to carry it to the top.

The same thing is true of business, as long as everything is rolling along and conditions are normal, business comes in a good volume without a great deal of effort but when a depression comes, or hard times, as we say it requires more effort, it takes more power to get the same amount of business.

"Stepping on the gas," in business is equivalent to larger advertising appropriations. When business is low, more pressure in the way of advertising must be applied.

Advertising is more important to business in times of depression than it is when all business is at a high tide.

The American buying public has become a race of newspaper reading people. They have become trained to read the advertisements for guidance and information in the matter of their purchases.

That advertising increases sales has become too well proven to admit an argument.

When the readers of a paper pick it up at a time like this and scan its pages and find no advertisements, two reactions take place: No new merchandise is offered for sale, no descriptions of desirable food products or furniture or clothing greets the eye or tempts the appetite or awakens the desire to buy. The possibility of a sale is lost.

The other reaction which perhaps means more at this time than actual sales of merchandise, is that if merchants are not advertising, times must really be hard and unconsciously the strings on the household purse are tightened and expenditures reduced whether the individual conditions warrant it or not.

Now is the time to "step on the gas."

Mr. and Mrs. Willard Hurni and family went to Warren, Ohio, Sunday to attend the funeral of a cousin, Ross Baker. They returned home Monday morning.

An 80 acre farm in Newville township involved in the foreclosure suit of the Prudential Insurance Co. of America against Daniel Sowers et al was sold Saturday by Sheriff John P. Hoff to the plaintiff for $4,671.08, the amount of the judgment, interest and costs.

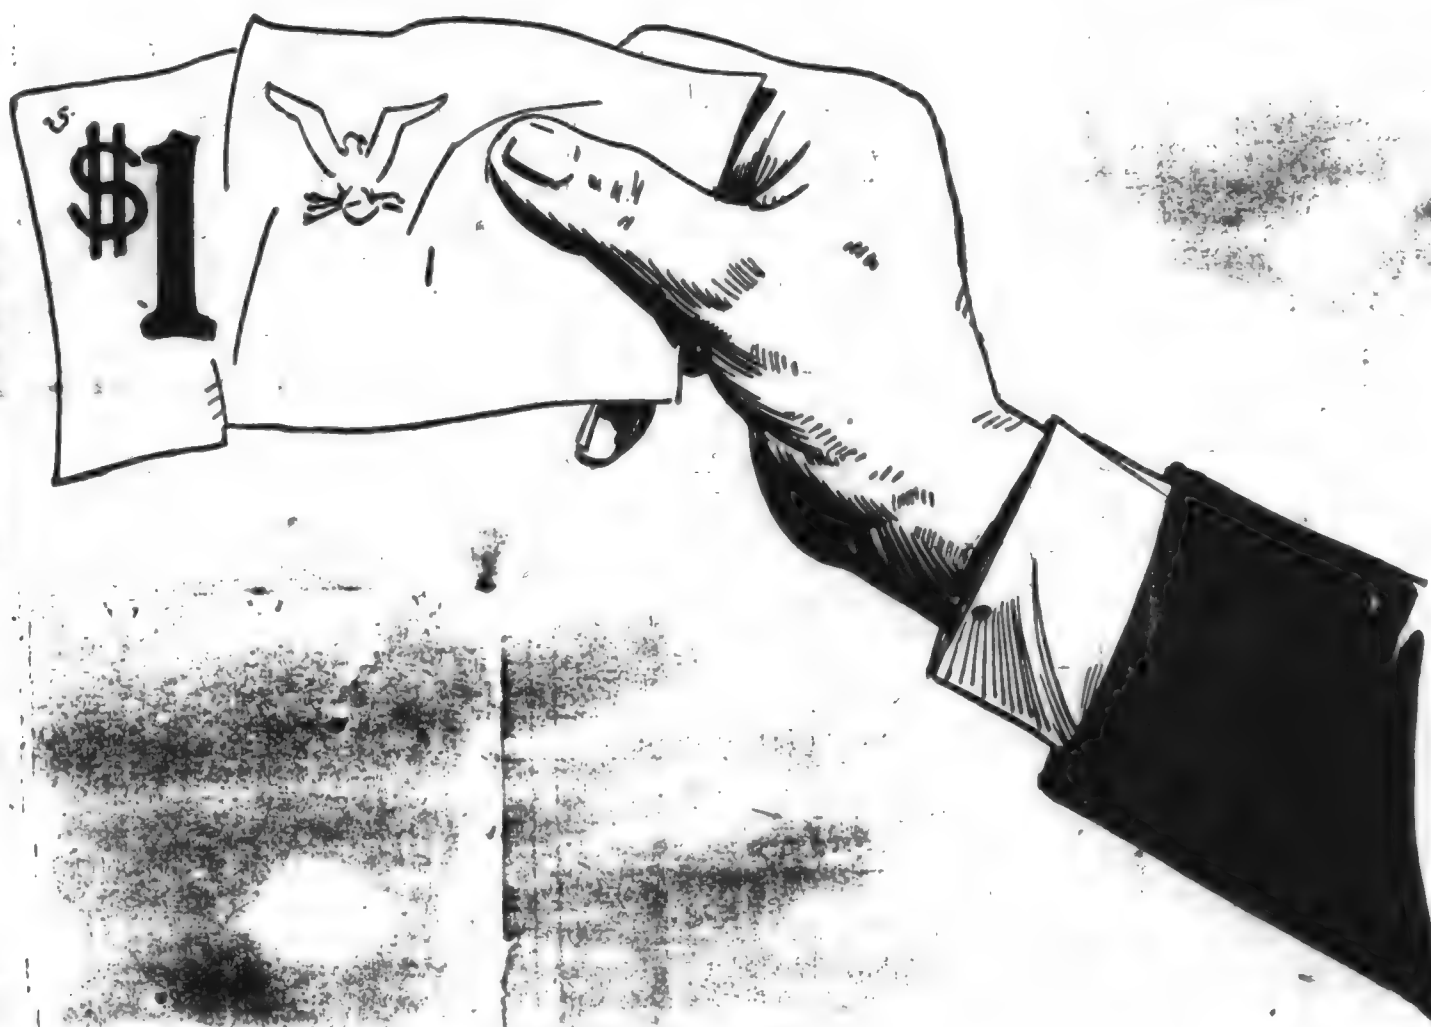

The bonus bill just passed by congress is being taken advantage of by thousands of World War veterans, and in Chicago alone approximately 1000 checks are being mailed daily. It has been suggested by authorities, that those veterans who are really not needing this financial assistance, refrain from making application for their loan. It may be that this courtesy will prove disastrous to many of the boys.

They will be required to pay interest on this loan and may not do this and the consequences will be that the government will be compelled to cancel the bonus in order to liquidate the loan made and the veteran will be without insurance entirely. Others will no doubt repay the loan and keep their insurance in full force.

Lesson for March 8 THE GOOD SAMARITAN

GOLDEN TEXT—Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people, but thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself: I am the Lord.
LESSON TEXT—Luke 10:25-37.
PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus' Story of a Real Friend.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus' Story of a Real Friend.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Serving and Sharing.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Stewardship of Life.

I. How to Inherit Eternal Life (vv. 25-38).

1. The lawyer's question (v. 25). The term "lawyer" here means one versed in religious law—the Scriptures, not lawyer in our modern sense of that term. It would more nearly correspond to our theological professor. The lawyer's object was to trip Jesus, to induce him to take such a stand as would weaken his influence as a teacher. He expected Jesus to set forth some new ceremonies which would conflict with or disparage the law of Moses.

2. Jesus' question (v. 26). Though Jesus knew the motive of the lawyer, he did not evade his question. He sent him to the law, the field which was familiar to him. He thus robbed him of his own weapon.

3. The lawyer's reply (v. 27). He made an intelligent answer, declaring that the entire content of the law was embraced in love to God and man. This expresses the whole of human duty.

4. Jesus' reply (v. 28). The straightforward answer went to the heart of the lawyer. Perfect love to God and man is truly the way of life. No man has yet had nor can have such love. His sinful condition precludes its possibility. Man's failure to measure up to this requirement is his condemnation. The lawyer keenly felt this thrust. He was defeated on his own ground and convicted of guilt.

II. Who is My Neighbor (vv. 29-37).
This question reveals the insincerity of the lawyer. Christ's answer had reached his conscience, and now he seeks to escape the difficulty by asking a captious question. Lawyers like to get off by raising a question as to the meaning of words.

2. Jesus' answer (vv. 30-37). Jesus' reply more than answered the lawyer's question. In the Parable of the Good Samaritan he makes clear who is a neighbor, and also what it means to be a neighbor and what loving a neighbor means. Christ's answer had a double meaning. He not only made clear who is my neighbor, but made it clear that the lawyer was not playing the neighbor.

a. Who is my neighbor? This destitute and wounded man, left on the wayside by the robbers, is a man who needs a neighbor. My neighbor, therefore, is the one who needs my help, whether he lives next door or on the other side of the world. It does not regard locality, nationality, or blood relation.

b. What being a neighbor means. "Who is my neighbor?" but "Whose neighbor am I?" To be a neighbor is: (1) To be on the lookout for those in need of our help (v. 33). It is keen to discern the needs of those with whom it is brought into contact. (2) To have compassion on the needy (v. 33). Christ's compassion was aroused as he came into contact with those who were suffering and in need. (3) To give to those in need (v. 34). Love does not calculate the cost of its actions. Whenever there is calculation of cost, there is the expression of selfishness. Many are willing to give money to help the poor and needy but are unwilling personally to minister to them. The true neighbor gives himself as well as his money.

(4) To bind up wounds (v. 34). If we have eyes to discern, we shall see many wounds about us that need attention. (5) To set the helpless ones on our beasts while we walk (v. 34). This is the proof of the genuineness of our love. Those who are like Christ will deny themselves in order to have something to give to those who are in need. (6) To bring to the inn and take care of the unfortunate (v. 34). Genuine love does not leave its service incomplete. True love follows up the needy. (7) To give money (v. 35). It costs a good deal to be a neighbor. Love is the most expensive thing in the world. It cost God his only Son. It cost Jesus Christ his life.

This parable has been through the centuries the classic illustration of true Christian neighborliness.

Born of God.
"He that loveth is born of God," therefore let us "keep our friendships in repair." Let us cultivate the spirit of friendship, and let the love of Christ develop in us a great love not only for our friends but for all humanity! —Henry Drummond.

God's Errands.
Difficulties are God's errands; and when we are sent upon them we should esteem it a proof of God's coöperation. —Henry Ward Beecher.

OLDER PEOPLE Must watch bowels Constantly!

As we grow older the bowels become more sluggish. They don't get rid of all the waste. Some days they do not move at all. So older people need to watch their bowels constantly. Only by doing this can they hope to avoid the many forms of sickness caused by constipation. When your bowels need help remember a doctor should know what is best for them, and get a bottle of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin from your druggist. Syrup Pepsin is a doctor's prescription for lagging bowels, good for all ages. No restriction of habits or diet is necessary while taking Syrup Pepsin. Made from fresh, laxative herbs, pure pepsin and other valuable ingredients, it is absolutely safe. It will not gripe, sicken or weaken you.

Take a spoonful next time your tongue is coated, or you have a bad taste in your mouth. It clears up a bilious, headachy, dull, weak, gassy condition every time. When you see how good it tastes and how nice it acts, you'll know why Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is the world's most popular laxative for every member of the family.

Avoid Burns from Mustard Plasters

When you have Rheumatic or Muscular Pains in the back, chest or limbs or if you have a cold coming on, try this simple treatment. It is more convenient, safer, cleaner and more effective than mustard plaster. Get a bottle of Hoff's Liniment and apply it with brisk rubbing. Then saturate a cloth with Hoff's and apply to the painful area and in a few minutes you will feel the warming and stimulating effect of this powerful liniment. Hoff's is different from ordinary liniments that are applied with rubbing alone. It brings a quick flow of blood to the affected area, reducing congestion and relieving pain. Get an eight ounce bottle of your druggist today for 60 cents. If you do not get relief in 30 minutes he is authorized to refund your money. Goodrich-Gamble Company, St. Paul, Minnesota.

CHAPTER VI

Sir George was looking at Roberta, despite the lovely scenery they were passing through. Confound it! The girl hadn't spoken to him yet. But he would not apologize. It would do no good anyway. The little spitfire would only use it against him. He wondered what she was thinking and would have been surprised if he had known that Roberta did not think when she was with him. Her intellectual faculties, as yet undeveloped, were rendered completely inoperative by his mere physical presence. Roberta resented this fact, but as yet had been unable to alter it. Let this man come into sight and she was unable to think about him, or anything else. All her faculties were absorbed in the process of feeling. The fact that she was a normal product of her time, and in no way resembling the blushing and gauche girl of the pre-war generation, unused to and too conscious of men, did not save her. However she sought to disguise it by blunt speech and equally blunt manner, Roberta was acutely conscious of Sir George and dreaded lest he, and others, might guess it.

Sir George lounged back and gazed at the road ahead of him, until finally the girl spoke: "Straight ahead until you reach this point in the road. Memorize it because you turn here to your left. I won't be with you next time."

He settled down and prepared to memorize the road. They were traveling inland now, toward a large town or a small city. He could not quite tell which it was. On its outskirts Robert MacBeth was constructing a tremendous viaduct, which would bring two states and two great routes together.

Presently they came within sight of the construction camp. Great sheds, which sheltered the supplies, bunk houses and tents which housed some of the workers, and everywhere sounds of activity, and of building. The picture was as old as the pyramids of Egypt and as fascinating as it was then. By and by, as the road grew narrower, Sir George caught sight of the construction engineer's shack and begged Roberta to set him down. He would go the rest of the way on foot, while Roberta turned her car and waited for him or drove a short distance away, and came back.

He left her reluctantly. Sir George had always found some girl willing to listen to him. It was a new sensation, and one he did not like, to have a scornful profile, no matter how pretty, continually turned toward him. He looked back at Roberta and smiled. His smile met with no response. The girl had been thinking, with inward delight, that if he went to Ray Browne, with that thesaurus, supercilious British accent and accent he would promptly be set in his place.

"I shan't be overlong," he called, merely to say something and break the awkward pause.

"Don't hurry," Roberta's voice, coldly sweet, came to him. "I don't mind in the least being left alone. Fact, I rather like it."

Well, that was that. He had finished trying to be agreeable to this girl. Absolutely finished!

He went toward the door of the shack and stood for a moment, his hand on the latch of the door, looking about him, drinking in the scene, with a certain feeling of homesickness. It suggested to him the activities of a war camp, and later still, the camp in Yucatan.

"Are you hanging on to that latch for moral or physical support? Won't those long legs support your heavy head?"

A rather short, sturdy young man was gently pushing the door from the other side and had called this to him through the crack.

"Oh, I say, stupid of me!" Sir George exclaimed, stepping aside. "But the whole thing's so d-d interesting I forgot myself. I'm looking for Mr. Raymond T. Browne, construction engineer. Will you kindly direct me?"

"Hest your eyes on me," Browne begged him softly. "This is Raymond T. What can I do for you?"

"Mr. MacBeth sent me," Sir George explained carefully. "I'm his private secretary."

"What happened to old Morrison?" "Oh, still at the office," Sir George reassured him. "Maybe I ought to have called myself Mr. MacBeth's home secretary. I'm the fellow at this end."

Browne took a good look at him and pulled him into the shack. "Come in and sit down. This is too good to be true. I heard there was one titled Scotch guy over here, but I never hoped to lay eyes on such."

He held out his hand. "Glad to see you here. Had a long distance call from the boss, saying that you would be up here today, so I'm all set."

"Yes," Sir George looked at him a trifle hesitantly. "I don't know what you mean. Would you mind going rather slowly with the great American slang, Mr. Browne, until I'm thoroughly acclimated?"

Browne laughed. "In other words, I'm ready with the goods for the Old Man. I've got my reports for you to take down the river, but I'd like to explain a few things first."

"Take long!" Browne frowned a little. "What's the everlasting hurry? Somebody's got to explain this to the Old Man, and why not you?"

"Why not, indeed? You will find me willing, but Mr. MacBeth's daughter is outside and I wondered if she could be induced to wait so long. Miss MacBeth brought me up here."

"What?" Browne rose to his feet. "Oh, you lucky pup, and it doesn't seem to excite you any. Mean to say you aren't having the time of your life living under the same roof with that peach of a girl?"

Sir George shook his head. "She may be a peach to you, but in your slang she's a lemon to me—or is it she hands me a lemon?"

Browne was pushing him toward the doorway. "Let's tell Miss Bobbie how long it will take us, and see if she will wait. Gee, is it possible that after the Old Man's sending for an imported article of large size and imposing presence like yourself, she still sticks to smaller but home-grown products? It is too good to be true!"

Sir George, following the engineer at a leisurely walk, was privileged to see Roberta MacBeth greet Ray Browne with a cordiality in marked contrast to the unfriendly and cold shoulder she had shown him. More over, she agreed to ride further up the river and then come back for both young men, giving Ray Browne time to explain himself to MacBeth's secretary. She promised also, with equal cordiality, to take both men to the next town, where Ray enthusiastically assured her he would dig up a tea place where they could dance.

Marveling at this friendliness, from the, to him, cold and unapproachable Roberta, Sir George watched her drive away. If she were always like that, no wonder Browne adored her. He noticed, however that after a brief but thorough tribute to the lady's beauty to business and, even to Sir George's critical eyes and ears, proved himself a good choice for the job, which he was in his own idiom "holding down."

Ray, as he talked, was studying the other man with just a little amazement, wondering what had brought this modern Beau Brummel—this British shik to be characterized him—to an American construction camp.

When Sir George in his turn began asking questions about the camp, however, Browne looked twice at this man who he had decided, at first glance, was one of those who made his way in the world by looks and influence, and had left gray matter out of the count. This fellow had gray matter. How much Browne could not yet say, but he had it, if he chose to use it; and beside it those looks and that height! Browne mentally shrugged his shoulders, as he put MacBeth's private and special report in a large and official envelope.

He dusted himself and his hat carefully, threw his working coat across the small room and landed it squarely on the hook he had selected, washed his hands, smoothed down his hair and declared himself ready.

Roberta not being in sight yet, Sir George detained Ray Browne as the latter prepared to go forth and search for the car. "I say, Browne, stay where you are. Miss MacBeth will be here just as soon as you don't run to meet her. I'd like a bit of information about the payroll trouble the MacBeth Construction company has had, either here or at the New York end."

"There was some little rumpus at the New York end. I wouldn't really dignify it by the name of trouble."

"Yet Mr. MacBeth seems to have the wind up about it."

Ray Browne grinned and nodded. "Funny! Must be because he's feeling a bit low."

Roberta drove forward, and Browne hastened toward her. Sir George took his time. He sauntered past the groups of foreign laborers, taking them all in his survey as a group first, and then patiently trying to memorize a few individual faces. It might be necessary, if there should ever be trouble, to remember some, at least, of the workmen on the inside.

He heard an exclamation and looked up, startled to see George stride forward, he could see that her face was white and that her left hand was covered with blood. He ran and reached her a second before Browne.

"What happened?" he asked, as he put his arm about her and lifted her from the car.

Roberta drew back. "I'm not going to faint. Some one—shooting at rabbits—winged me."

Browne gave an exclamation and bent over the hand which Sir George was examining.

"Flowed across your fingers," Sir George announced. "Painful, but not dangerous. Of course, you have first aid stuff here, Browne?"

"Surest thing you know," Browne told him. "Come along, Miss MacBeth, we'll have you fixed in no time."

Sir George lifted her in his arms, and strode toward the shack, followed by the disgruntled Ray, who was sure he was quite as strong and would have given much to have shown Roberta that strength.

In Browne's office Roberta was placed in a chair and then given a glass of water by Browne, who washed the hand and gave it first-aid treatment. Sir George, who felt he could have made a much better and quicker job of that bandage than Browne, asked Roberta where she had been when she was shot. On receiving her answer that it was on the rough road that led from the main highway to the construction camp, he left with a murmured statement that he would come back in a moment.

Browne raised his eyebrows at Roberta and asked, "What does he think he's going to do?"

"I don't know," said Roberta, who was feeling rather limp. "Probably thinks he can get the man, but he won't. I heard him scramble off among the bushes."

"D— fool! Might have murdered you."

"Yes, but I don't think that was what he meant to do, and I'm glad he got away. Run along and see that 'Beauty' Sandison comes to no harm. I'm responsible to my father and aunt for him."

Browne did so somewhat reluctantly, divided between the desire to stay with the girl and the feeling that as engineer in charge at this end he must see that he was not left out of anything that the other man started.

It was a rotten thing that had happened to the girl, but he could not have Sir George starting any trouble or excitement at his camp.

When he stepped outside, he stepped into practically an empty camp, save for a man on guard who told him excitedly in broken English that the big fellow had taken all the men off the job to hunt the man who had shot Miss MacBeth.

Browne hurried in the direction the laborer pointed out, to find the woods and the old quarry full of foremen and their men. Browne had to admit that this Beauty Sandison knew something about directing men. It was a quiet search, systematically going for ward with very little noise or excitement. Sir George came up to Browne with an empty shell in his hand.

"Found this and the marks of a strange car over there," He pointed toward the entrance to the construction road. "Think we might as well call off the men now. If the fellow had a car he's miles away by this time. No use looking for him here."

Browne agreed, and gave the signal for the men to return, promising that he would take care, if anything came to light tomorrow, that Mr. MacBeth was immediately informed.

Sir George went to the car and stood so long before it that Browne who had been consulting with the foreman, came up to him and paused.

"What next?"

Red Men by No Means Lacking in Imagination

A recent visitor to the Agawa canyon, along the Algoma Central railway, was astonished to observe on the rockface the well-defined head of an old man, as though roughly carved by some giant sculptor. The incident started a train of reflection covering the Indian legends of the Northland.

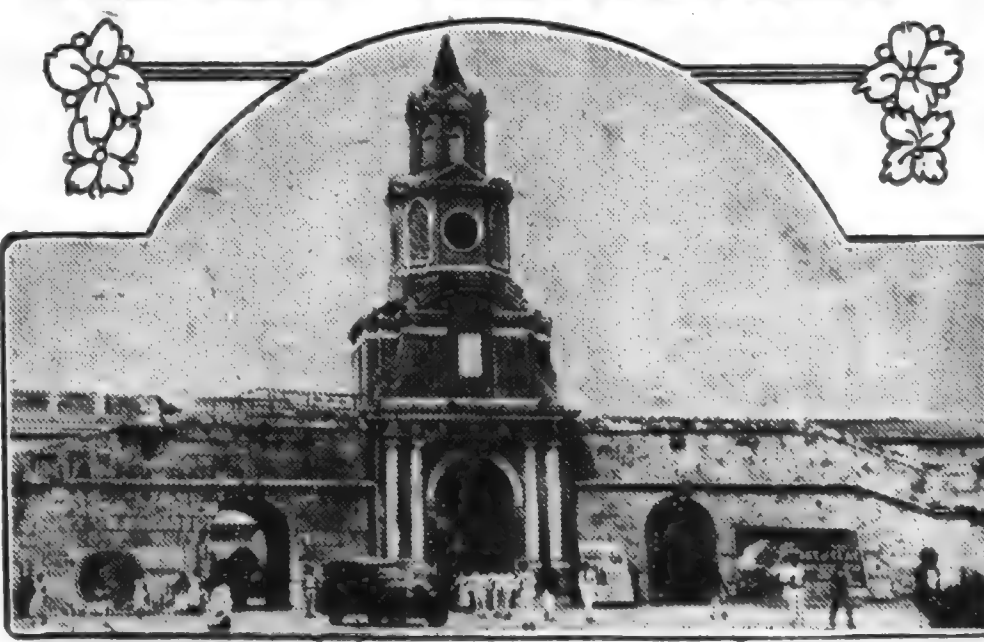

Haughty white men, greedily depriving the Indians of their ancient empire, long fostered the notion that the "untutored" and "uncivilized" possessed no imagination. As early as 1837, however, Father Le Jeune, a Jesuit missionary, found they were in the habit of entertaining themselves by fanciful tales, and wrote his opinion that "the savages, in point of intellect, may be placed in a high rank. Education and instruction alone are wanting." Charlevoix said: "Their barangues are full of shining passages which would have been applauded at Rome or Athens." Modern Canadian readers know the beauty of Indian oratory, such as those of Tecumseh, or the simple dignity and imaginative quality of the speeches of Crowfoot and other chiefs who met the whites in the seventies and made treaties for the surrender of the Canadian West—The Globe (Toronto).

Hales and Rains

Since hail occurs in high thin clouds of small ice crystals, and since such clouds occur on the forward side of a widespread storm of cyclone, it follows that rain or snow usually occurs within a day or two after a hail is seen.

Rich Colombia

Chief Gateway to Cartagena.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)
NORRIS by Columbia of the export tax on bananas to three cents a bunch calls attention to a country which contributes other important items besides tropical fruit to the consumers of the United States. Approximately twelve million bunches of bananas were exported last year, practically all of them to the United States.

Colombia, which occupies the northeastern corner of South America and forms the southern "abutment" of the Isthmus of Panama, is typical of the entire northern and northeastern portion of the South American continent. It is tremendously rich in all sorts of natural resources and very largely undeveloped.

It has an area of nearly half a million square miles, which means that it is almost twice the size of Texas; yet it has only about one-tenth of the railroad mileage of that state. To put it differently, there is a mile of railway in the United States as a whole for every 12 square miles of area, while in Colombia there is only a mile of railway for every 270 square miles of area. Most of the Colombian railways are of narrower gauge, by a foot or more, than those of the United States. They do not form a system, but for the most part are in lengths of twenty-five to a hundred or so miles, scattered about the country.

Bogota, the capital of Colombia, is situated between the ranges of the Andes on a plateau at an elevation of more than a mile and a half. It is approximately 450 miles from the Caribbean sea along the most accessible route, and 200 miles from the Pacific across the Andes. It has no rail connection with either sea. To reach it one must fly or travel for more than 500 miles up the winding course of the Magdalena river by boat, skirting rapids by means of a short length of railroad, and finally cover the last 50 miles from the head of navigation by rail.

The land-river trip sometimes requires several weeks. Transportation of supplies throughout much of the interior is by means of mule-back along rough, narrow mountain paths. The few carriage roads are in the Magdalena delta near the coast and in the vicinity of Bogota on the plateau.

Vast Grazing Plains.

More than half of the area of Colombia lies east of the three ranges of the Andes and consists of plains country sloping toward the center of the continent and drained by the headwaters of the great Amazon and Orinoco river system. Covered with succulent grasses, these plains form an unsurpassed stock-raising country. It is largely unutilized and is to be compared with the plains of Rhodesia, a country in southern Africa, as one of the richest unoccupied regions suitable for cattle raising remaining in the world. It is estimated that more than ten million head of cattle could be pastured on these "llanos" of eastern Colombia.

Colombia's climatic variety from the sub-tropical near the shores of the Caribbean, to Alpine in the higher Andes. Forests cover millions of acres, the deltas and river valleys yield cotton, tobacco, cacao, bananas, rubber and other tropical and sub-tropical products, while on the hillside coffee thrives. Annual coffee exports often reach a value of $15,000,000, while the yearly banana shipments have grown to a value of approximately $10,000,000. On the plains grain and other temperate crops may be grown. The need for railroads in Colombia is indicated by the fact that, though considerable quantities of grain are produced on the interior plateau, it has always been cheaper to buy grain from the United States in the Colombian coast cities after it has been shipped thousands of miles, than to transport the domestic grain the few hundred miles from its place of production.

Gold has always been one of the important products of Colombia. Since the coming of the sixteenth century and beginning of the nineteenth century, it is estimated, has been mined from the country. About $2,000,000 worth is produced annually at present. The country supplies nearly half the world production of platinum. Iron ore and numerous other minerals are present in payable quantities. Perhaps most important of all, Colombia has a vast reservoir of petroleum beneath her soil. In 1930 more than 20 million barrels were produced.

Old City of Cartagena.

Colombia was named for Christopher Columbus who in 1502 started in the country, where the Isthmus of Panama meets South America, the first settlement on the mainland in the New world. This settlement was short-lived. Cartagena, one of the chief ports, was established in 1533. It was heavily fortified by the Spaniards and served as the collection point and place of safe keeping for the treasure from both coasts of South America, preliminary to its perodical shipment to Spain under convoy.

This old city lies on a peninsula joined to the mainland by a causeway. Its gray and ivory stone and brick houses with their corrugated red roofs contrast with the green hills that rise in the background and form a pleasant picture from the water.

Lying parallel to the mainland is Tierra Bomba Island, which must be skirted by vessels entering the harbor of Cartagena. Of the two entrances the Boca Grande (Large Mouth) is nearest the city; but it is too shallow for shipping to pass through, so the lower entrance or Boca Chica (Small Mouth), which lies eight miles distant, is utilized.

Walls in some places forty feet thick encircle the old town and recall the days when the city was one of the strongest defenses on the Spanish Main. Although they are now dismantled, several well-preserved fortresses, which dot the walls, present a military aspect.

Arches, balconies and grills give Cartagena an Moorish air as any city of southern Spain. Crumbling arches and faded plaster structures attest the city's age. Many of the balconies exhibit fanciful carving in stone and the grills are often wrought iron in arabesque designs. The doors and windows which front on the narrow, dark, cobble-stoned streets are heavily grilled.

Burros and automobiles pass through the chief gate of Cartagena, a venerable structure of yellow stone surmounted by a steepie. Electric lights brighten the streets that once echoed to the footsteps of Sir Francis Drake's plundering crew. Tanneries roll along under overhanging balconies of lime or orange plaster. Women in Parisian dresses shop in the tiny stores by their stocks of brilliant shawls, jewelry, or luscious tropical fruit, which nestle in the colonnades surrounding the Plaza de Los Coches. The marble pulp of the Jesuit church of Saint John of God is celebrated throughout South America.

Negroes and Syrians There.

At present Cartagena is secondary in commercial importance to Barranquilla, which is also a Caribbean seaport. Nevertheless, it does a thriving trade and two-masted schooners as well as large merchant steamers line the waterfront. The bulk of the exports which pass through the town consist of coffee, cacao, hides, gold, platinum, balsam and cacao. Negroes in canoes carry on traffic with natives in the many small towns bordering the mainland.

The larger part of Cartagena's population is negro, while mestizos or mixed Indians and whites form the comparatively small middle class, and pure whites of Spanish descent form only about a tenth. About half the business in Cartagena is carried on by Syrians. They have agents throughout the town and country, and no hamlet in the interior is free from a visit from a Syrian peddler with his omnipresent pack. The railroad out of Cartagena extends only to Gilmar, about 65 miles distant, but the intrepid peddlers pierce the interior afoot or by canoe. Much of the profits of the Syrian merchants is invested in Colombian mines and real estate.

Before the war Cartagena's imports came largely from Europe because the average Cartagena business man had traveled in Europe, was familiar with European wares and felt a racial compatibility with Europeans. During the war when transatlantic commercial shipping was tied up, he was forced to become acquainted with American products. Since then commerce between the United States and Colombia has grown by leaps and bounds. The proximity of the two countries and the rapid delivery of goods has largely been responsible for this growth.

After independence was won from Spain in 1819 Colombia was combined with Venezuela and Ecuador as "the Republic of Colombia." Later there was a separation and Colombia became by turns the "Republic of New Granada," the "Confederation of Granadina," the "United States of Colombia," and finally in 1886 again the "Republic of Colombia." Bolivar, though born in Venezuela, led the Colombians to liberty and became the first president of the republic.

How to Avoid "Spring Fever"

The onions that "bloom in the spring tra la," and all the other things that this delightfully balmy season brings, are to quote a popular song, "just around the corner—waiting for you!"

But before this joyous season arrives, it would behoove the most of us to get ready for it—by seeing that our bodies are functioning properly, and well able to withstand the onslaught of the changing season.

"Spring fever," that ancient and time-honored ailment we were wont to dose with the dark brown horror of sulphur and molasses, is not so mythical as we think. It is really an outward evidence of the depleted state of our bodily "tone," an outward sign of lack of stored-up vitamins and energy, that sometimes accompanies the inactive winter months.

The way, then, to avoid spring fever—and therefore the dread, familiar tonic—is to be sure the body gets its full supply, right now, of the minerals and vitamins necessary to health.

Green vegetables and fruits should be plentiful in the diet, of course. An added source of energy for these last few cold weather weeks may be nicely supplied with an abundance of those foods which supply the essentials. Dried fruits, dates in particular, are extremely helpful, for they supply iron for the red corpuscles, calcium for the teeth and bones, besides other minerals, and the vitamins A and B.

Here are excellent spring recipes, all guaranteed good enough to dispel and memories of sulphur and molasses. Notice that many of them contain rhubarb, a favorite spring time delicacy.

Rhubarb Vanity

1 lb. pink rhubarb, 1 cup shredded coconut, 1 cup sugar, 2 egg whites.

Wash rhubarb and cut without peeling into 1/2 inch pieces. Place rhubarb and sugar in tightly covered saucepan and cook over low heat until juice begins to flow. Uncover and cook to the consistency of marmalade, stirring frequently. Then cool. Fold cold mixture and 1/4 cup coconut into stiffly beaten egg whites. Pile whip into sherbet glasses; sprinkle with remaining coconut. Chill thoroughly. Serve with cream or with custard made from egg yolks and one cup of milk. This recipe will make six generous servings. This may be made with any fruit which has a tart flavor and decided color.

Syrup Bran Bread

1 1/2 cups dark corn syrup, 1 tsp. soda, 1 1/2 cups sour milk, 1 1/2 cups bran, 1/2 cup seeded raisins, 2 tps. baking powder, 1/2 tsp. salt. Sift dry ingredients except bran. Mix liquids, add bran, raisins and dry ingredients. Bake in oiled loaf pan 45 minutes starting at 300 deg. F. for 15 minutes, increasing to 350 deg. F. and 400 deg. F. for the last 30 minutes.

Energy Salad

1/2 pkg. pasteurized dates, 1 pkg. cream cheese lettuce, 2 tps. chopped parsley, 2 tps. seedless raisins, salad dressing. Mince parsley by forming the leaves into a compact ball and cutting with scissors. Mash cheese with a fork and add parsley and raisins. Moisten if necessary with cream or salad dressing. Stuff pitted dates with cheese mixture and serve on lettuce with favorite salad dressing. 4 servings.

Spring Conserve

1 1/2 lbs. rhubarb, 8 cups sugar, 1 pkg. pasteurized dates, 2 tps. orange juice, 1 tsp. grated orange rind, 1/2 cup broken nut meats.

Cook the rhubarb, cut in inch pieces, sugar, dates, orange rind and juice until thick, about 45 minutes. Add the nuts. Pour into jelly glasses. Cool. Cover with melted paraffin. Fills about 8 ounce jelly glasses.

Rhubarb Betty

2 cups soft bread crumbs, 2 tps. butter, 3 cups rhubarb, 1 cup sugar, 1/4 tsp. cinnamon, 1/4 tsp. nutmeg, 1 pkg. shredded coconut, 1 orange.

Melt butter and add crumbs, mix sugar, spice, orange rind and coconut. Put 1/4 of crumbs in bottom of buttered baking dish; then 1/2 rhubarb; sprinkle with 1/2 sugar mixture; add one-quarter of crumbs and remainder of the rhubarb and sugar mixture. Sprinkle orange juice over this and put rest of crumbs over top. Cover closely and bake 45 minutes in moderately hot oven (400 deg. F.) Uncover and brown quickly. Serve plain or with hard or foamy sauce. Serves 6 to 8 people.

PERSONAL PARAGRAPHS

The fruiting spur of the apple may bear year after year.

Some people think every season comes at the wrong time of the year.

Road contractors are busy on the Wm. Staman and Wallace A. bel roads.

Jesse Loftus is the owner of a 1929 Ford Coupe, and it cost him 15 cents.

Harold, Rose Mary and Donald Yeiser are all on the sick list with very bad colds.

Miss Helen Dittmars was on the sick list Tuesday and unable to take her place at school.

Mrs. Glen Freeburn is here for a few days visit with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Wine-land.

Mr. and Mrs. Glen Wineland of Holgate, were guests one day last week in the John Wineland home.

C. W. Hanna and family moved Monday into the H. S. Bowman property, recently purchased. They have been living in the B. S. Sheffer residence.

Now is a good time to purchase breeding ewes for a farm flock. Buy ewes that are active, healthy, and well grown; uniform in size and breeding; covered with dense fleeces of marketable wool; and sound in mouth and udder.

Mr. and Mrs. Adam Shilling and son, Howard Shilling, went to Lagrange Monday to visit Mrs. Shilling's sister, Mrs. B. S. Dorsey, who is seriously ill with double pneumonia. They also called on Mrs. Estella Green of the same place.

A bill to prohibit the use of motor boats on lakes of less than 325 acres at low water mark from April 1 to June 15 has been passed in the Indiana house. A maximum fine of $25 and six months imprisonment is established. The measure is designed as a protection for fish.

COLORED OLEO HIT BY LEGISLATION

(Special to St. Joe News)

Washington, D. C., March 2, 1931.—All yellow oleo must pay ten cents per pound tax according to bill just passed by the House of Representatives and now pending before the Senate. It was strongly supported by David Hogg, of Indiana, who said, "It costs six to nine cents a pound to make oleo. It is colored to look like butter and then it sells for several times the cost. It is the butter color that sells it. Oleo is not good for children. This legislation will help both the farmer and the public."

DO YOU LISTEN TO THAT SLICK SALESMAN?

Some merchants will give an order for printed stationery or other kinds of printed matter to a traveling salesman before even consulting the local printer to know whether he can meet or beat the prices, quality of stock considered. These high-powered fellows will try to make you believe the home printer cannot do certain classes of work and in some cases get by with it. The facts are The News has connections whereby we can handle any kind of printing that anyone else can handle. Recently the St. Joe Filling Station wanted a quantity of duplicate tickets put up in rolls and numbered. Our equipment would not produce this class of work, and only few offices do this, but we were able to take the job of 5,000 tickets and produce them to our customer in a few days. Your needs can be taken care of here. The outside firm cares nothing about you or your business only to the extent of getting your work.

AUTOMOBILE OWNERS—WAKE UP!

The Legislature is on the verge of diverting much of your good roads' money and also putting three million dollars more tax on you by increased license fees. Both these measures have been passed by the Senate and the members of the house will listen to your protest if you make it at once.

This appeal was issued by the Hoosier State Automobile Association with further comment as follows:

"The motoring public is taxed more than any other class of people. If the Legislature is unwilling to let good roads money continue to be used for good roads, then the motorist should have his special taxes reduced just that much. This money should not be appropriated for other uses."

"The gasoline tax, personal property tax and the license fees will average at least $35.00 per car. All automobiles, after the first six months to one year, and this means the big majority, would not sell for an average of $350.00 each. This means that these automobiles are being taxed 10% a year and we believe no other class of property is taxed one half that much."

"There are some automobile owners who escape the personal property tax and that is not right, but for that matter a lot of other wealth and property is not taxed that should be taxed. There are 900,000 automobile owners in Indiana and they should realize that now it is necessary for them to protect their own interests. The organized motorists, which means the motor club organizations, are waging the strongest battle they can to prevent the motoring public from being abused in this tax situation. The personal property tax goes into the general fund the same as any other general tax money, therefore the motorist is doing his share there. All these other taxes are special taxes and the gas tax and the license fees are for the purpose of getting good roads. They were levied for that purpose. If this money cannot be spent for good roads then these taxes should be reduced, they should not be used for other purposes. Then, in addition to all these taxes the motorist pays his certificate of title tax and his driver's license fee."

Important "Facts for Farmers"

Farmers To Treat Oats For Smut This Spring

Treatment of seed oats for smut using formaldehyde is a long established practice of successful farmers in Indiana. In fact, farmers in this state were the first to learn of the formaldehyde treatment for smut, it being the result of investigational work at the Purdue University Agricultural Experiment Station a number of years ago.

Treatment of seed about once in three years usually is sufficient to keep the smut in control, according to Dr. C. T. Gregory, plant disease specialist of the Purdue Agricultural Extension Department. In untreated fields, where smut attacks the crop, the loss is likely to run more than a tenth of the yield; frequently losses from smut are as high as a third of the crop, and 80 per cent losses have been reported. The loss from smut in the state has declined in late years, largely through the fairly widespread practice of using the formaldehyde treatment to control the disease.

A pint of formaldehyde which probably will cost about 75 cents is sufficient to treat 40 to 50 bushels of oats; about five gallons of water is added to make the material easier to distribute through the oats. The seed should be piled on a smooth floor, tarpaulin, or wagon box; while one man using a large scoop shovel turns the oats, another operates the sprinkling can, sprinkling at intervals so that every other scoopedful receives a dousing of the solution. The seed should be covered with sacks or similar material to hold in the gas for at least two hours. After that, the seed may be planted, or may be left in the pile, or sacked. There is some slight danger of injuring the seed if it is left exposed to the gas for several weeks, but in sack- ing, the gas escapes to such an extent that there is no danger of injury.

There is not enough water added to the seed in treating it to cause swelling or germination.

Use Oil Spray To Kill Cottony Maple Scale

For the past few years, many complaints have been received from residents throughout the northern half of Indiana, calling attention to the abundance and destructiveness of the cottony maple scale. In many cases branches and eventually entire trees have died as a result of this scale which sucks the juices from the tree and thus seriously weakens it. Control is possible, according to J. J. Davis, head of the Entomology Department of the Purdue University Agricultural Experiment Station, if control measures are applied during the dormant season, when the trees are bare of foliage and when the insect is in a susceptible stage of development.

An oil emulsion or miscible oil may be used with effective results. The miscible oils should be diluted according to recommendations on the container for a dormant spray control. For heavy infestations oil emulsion should be used at the rate of 4 1/2 gallons per 100 gallon tank. Spraying should be done at any time during the dormant season when the temperature is 40 deg. F. or above. It is exceedingly important to thoroughly spray every branch and every part of every branch, as these sprays kill only in contact with the insect.

The scales at the present time are inconspicuous as small, flat, brown scales, and if allowed to develop this spring they will suck quantities of sap from the tree and by early summer the conspicuous cottony masses, each containing 2,000 or more eggs, will develop. Spraying should not be delayed until the buds open up.

Gooseberries and currants prefer a heavy, moist soil, and will grow well in partial of total shade.

FREE COOKING SCHOOL ON THURSDAY AND FRIDAY, MARCH 19 AND 20, FROM 2 TO 4 P. M.

On March 19th and 20th, at 2 P. M. the Indiana & Michigan Electric Company, will open their third annual Cooking School, in the room formerly occupied by the McCleery grocery, at Butler. This is a two day school and will be conducted by Mrs. Alma F. Hunt, the national and community home economist. She is known as a leader in her profession and on many occasions has been highly honored by recognized food authorities. She has held schools in all sections of the United States, and we are indeed fortunate in securing her services.

Mrs. Hunt has rare ability in selecting the best and right kind of food, and this food will be prepared and demonstrated with the most modern conveniences, the Super Automatic Hotpoint Electric Range and the Monitor Top All Steel-General Electric Refrigerator.

It is a great recognized fact that the chief of all home keeping demands of today is the proper preparation and cooking of foods. The charm of the home and all it means vanishes if the meals are not balanced and attractively served.

It is because of this fact and the great need for keeping the home which is our country's greatest of all institutions, together that the Indiana & Michigan Electric Company is so enthusiastic in bringing Mrs. Hunt to the residents of Butler and vicinity.

This school is absolutely free in every respect, no attendance fee is required, everyone is most welcome to come each afternoon at no cost to them. They can enjoy a pleasant afternoon and an opportunity to gain much useful information and obtain new recipes. Men and boys are also welcome to come. Many men are good cooks, and when they have mastered a recipe are as successful as the ladies in its preparation.

PROGRAM

Mrs. Hunt will follow a certain program each day. She will prepare and cook food as she lectures and works. She will explain each step as it is taken and will cook the food correctly while the audience watches. She will bring recipes new to this part of the country, providing pleasant charges from the usual routine of food.

The dainty touches in cooking the simplest way in which to make the most difficult dish, the proper food to serve on certain occasions, will all be set forth by Mrs. Hunt. Salads, desserts, cakes, pies and meats will be included in the program.

There will be a question and answer period, anyone can ask questions on any household problems that are disturbing them. This will be a very attractive feature of her program and should be made use of by those desiring information. Mrs. Hunt will be in the building a greater part of each morning and will be glad to meet anyone desiring personal service. Mrs. Hunt is also a recognized authority and possesses many degrees from various institutions and the people are fortunate in getting her service.

This is the third time that the Indiana & Michigan Electric Company has been able to bring Mrs. Hunt to you, and the ladies in this city and community should not miss the wonderful opportunity of hearing her again. Come and urge your friends to come with you. FREE DAILY PRIZES.

FISH AND GAME CLUB HAVE RE-ORGANIZATION.

The St. Joe Fish and Game Club, which is the largest organization of its kind in DeKalb County, met in the town hall on Thursday of last week to elect officers, and lay plans for work for the year.

The activities of the club have been practically suspended for a considerable time, and it was thought by energetic live ones, that this condition ought not to exist. So a meeting was called with the result that thirty members were secured for the nucleus, around which, it is reasonably hoped, a large and fine reorganized club will be built. As a result of the balloting, the following named officers were elected for the year:

President, Ralph Schler.
Vice Pres., John Crothers.
Treasurer, F. R. Bowman.
Secretary, D. W. Yeiser.

A list of names of past active members of the club was read, and from these names, together with those members present, five men were selected by ballot, to serve as directors. The names of those elected were:

Lester Coburn
Harvey Kimes
Ed Storer
Wm. Keeler.

Ralph Schler, president and presiding officer, reported a balance of $72.36 in the treasury. D. W. Yeiser, treasurer.

It was decided that future meetings would be held on Thursday, instead of on Friday as heretofore.

Two captains, Frank Leighty and Glen Cole, were appointed to direct their campaign for a membership drive.

A fine spirit was manifested and great interest shown, and indications all point to a fine live club.

H. C. Hathaway and L. E. Harding, of Auburn and a number from Spencer were present.

Hot dogs and coffee were served at the close of the business session.

PERSONAL PROPERTY VALUED AT $107,151.97

The late Mrs. Amelia Benninghoff of St. Joe, left bonds, certificates of deposit and other personal property in the amount of $107,151.97, plus $650 in household goods, according to the appraisal filed in the DeKalb circuit court by Merritt Sechler, executor of the will.

Mrs. Benninghoff owned bonds as follows: Brown township school house, Jennings township school house, Cass township school house, Jefferson township school house, Vernon township school house, city of Fort Wayne, Middle township school house, Reserve township school house, Allen county tuberculosis hospital, DeKalb county roads, Wabash township school house, Kosciusko county roads, Allen county drains, LaGrange county roads, Adams township road, Wayne township, Kosciusko county road, Aboite township, Monroe township road, Sharon Terrace school, Allen county jail, Union township, Whitely county school, Liberty Loan and Philippine Islands.

The certificates of deposit amount to $877.32. Mrs. Benninghoff also held notes of the total of $2,073. Her interest in the Joseph Sechler estate is valued at $58,376.72.

The appraisal of the personal property was made by M. E. Storer and Carl E. Perkins.

CHRISTENA ENGLE IS BENEFICIARY OF WILL

Mrs. Alice Simanton was bequeathed all of the property of her husband, the late John H. Simanton of Auburn, by his will admitted to probate in the DeKalb circuit court, for her use during her lifetime. At her death the property remaining was bequeathed to Christena Engle. In the event that Mrs. Simanton died before her husband, the property was to go to Christena Engle. The will was signed last August 23, with L. E. Potter and A. P. Alling as witnesses. The death of Mrs. Simanton did take place before that of her husband.

STATE TO INSPECT PAVING OF ROADS

The paving of the Waterloo Hamilton and St. Joe-Spencerville roads will be state-inspected, as a result of petitions from taxpayers approved by the county commissioners Wednesday following the letting of the contracts. The auditor was directed to notify the state highway commission to appoint an inspector for each road.

The county board also ordered bonds sold for the two projects. It is expected work of construction will be started within a few weeks. Ray L. Harris of Fort Wayne, will build the Waterloo Hamilton road and Tri-Lakes Construction Co. of Columbia City, holds the contract for the St. Joe-Spencerville pavement.

Bonds also were ordered sold for the Alvin Steckley road in Wilmington township. This contract was awarded to Sparling & May of Fort Wayne.

The drainage commissioners for the Martin Wagner drain filed their report of reappointment and assessment which was approved. Notice was ordered given to landowners allowing them ninety days to pay their assessments.

No remonstrances being filed, the petition for the repair of the Daniel Shilling drain was ordered docketed as a pending cause and Chas. Staman was appointed superintendent of construction. The auditor was directed to give notice that bids on a carload of creosoted 2x4 for bridge flooring will be received April 7.

ASKING FORECLOSURE ON NEWVILLE TOWNSHIP FARM

An action to foreclose a mortgage on 214.50 acres of land in Newville township, has been filed in DeKalb circuit court by Carrie Bassett, Susie Hardesty, Alda Ditenhaver and Orton P. Bevington, trustees of the estate created for the benefit of Nettie Bevington.

The complaint says that on Oct. 20, 1919, Ray M. and Millie A. Herrick gave Wm. E. Ditenhaver, executor of the will of the late John M. Ainsworth, notes for the total sum of $11,737.50, secured by a mortgage on the land; that the first notes were due in five years; that the mortgage was transferred to the plaintiffs in the settlement of the estate and that the Herricks conveyed 94.50 acres of the land to Geo. C. and Lucile F. Strubing.

The complaint states that the amount due and unpaid is $9,689.07 and the judgment demanded is for $9,928.33. The plaintiffs' attorneys are Atkinson & Huselton of Auburn, and L. E. Griffin. The latter was appointed receiver for the property and furnished $500 bond, with Edgar W. Atkinson as surety.

The legal notice pertaining to this action will be found in this issue of The News.

DEKALB COUNTY BANKERS DECIDE ON SERVICE FEE

The DeKalb County Bankers' association, meeting at the Auburn Country club Wednesday evening, voted to establish a service charge for small checking accounts based on the activity of the account, effective June 1.

For several years the organization has been considering such a move as the small accounts have cost the banks a great deal more money than they realize from them. Fort Wayne banks recently adopted the service charge and many of the other counties in this section of the state likewise have collected a small fee where the bank balance dropped below $50.

CELEBRATE THEIR SIXTY- FIFTH ANNIVERSARY

Sunday, March 8, was a glad day in the William Staman country home, north of St. Joe, when their children, Mr. and Mrs. Vern King, of Sturgis, Michigan; Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Newman, of Coldwater, Michigan; Mr. and Mrs. Ashton Staman, of Auburn, and Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Staman, of St. Joe, all gathered at the parental home and helped to celebrate the sixty-fifth anniversary of their wedding, the event being entirely a surprise.

Mr. and Mrs. Staman were married at Haystack, Ashland County, Ohio, March 8, 1866 and lived there until 1874, when they moved to DeKalb County and located on the farm where they now reside.

Mr. Staman has been extremely active and was 88 years old last September 8, and Mrs. Staman will be 83 on April 23. Mrs. Cowan, a sister of Mrs. Staman, who has made her home there for the past two years, was 87 years old last September 7th.

May this couple live to enjoy many other anniversaries and may their family ties be bound together for many years. This is indeed a wonderful family record for longevity.

They will return by Siam, Burma, India, Baluchistan, Persia, and Arabia, lands traversed by Marco Polo in the 13th Century and scarcely visited by Europeans since that time.

The expedition will cross lofty plateaus and some of the highest mountains. On the top of the world they will leave the light cars that have brought them so far, as the legendary American foreok his prairie wagon when it no longer served him. They will descend to the plain on foot, there to find heavy tractors, and an amazing auto-kitchen, the pride

HIGH EGG PRODUCTION NECESSARY FOR PROFIT

(By Prof. H. D. Munroe)

Egg prices are universally low this spring. During the spring months it is necessary and easy to get high egg production from a flock in order to make a profit.

By using the following plan you can, at any time, find out if your hens are paying for their feed. If they are not, change the feeding plan to increase production; cull the non-producers and you can make money in spite of low egg prices.

Divide the cost of 50 pounds of mash and 50 pounds of scratch by the price of eggs; multiply this by three and you will have the per cent production necessary to pay for feed. All eggs above this per cent is profit.

To illustrate:
50 lbs. scratch ..... $1.00
50 lbs. mash ..... $1.25

Divided by 15 cents ..... 15
Multiplied by 3 ..... 45%

In other words, this flock, considering these prices, must lay 45% to pay for their feed. If they will produce at the rate of 60% the owner will secure a nice profit if eggs are only 15 cents a dozen.

Try this on your flock.

FUNERAL ANNOUNCEMENT

Mrs. Mary Buchanan, a life long resident of St. Joe, passed away at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Frank Rhoades, at Ft. Wayne Sunday.

The funeral will be held Thursday at 2 P. M. either from the Kinsey funeral home or the M. P. Church.

Unfurred Coats for Spring Wear

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

If it is unfurred, is made of a stunning spongy wool weave, if it has a "tricky" scarf arrangement and an unusual sleeve, then, depend on it, the coat which answers to this description is a brand-new this-season model.

Just such a coat is shown in the illustration—Rita La Roy of Radio Players pictures, posing. Both the coat and the matching beret are fashioned of tweed, the new soft, spongy kind, in mottled beige and brown tones. A scarf collar, cape sleeves and a narrow leather belt are distinguishing features.

Spring coat collections especially emphasize the favor for spongy fabrics of subdued mixture construction. Skipper blue, tan tones, brown, green and some red are prominent. Gray has come into its own for dressier models and white nubbed black tweed registers smartly for sports types.

Odd sleeves, new-type scarfs, low-placed big square revers and all sorts of belt treatments ranging from narrow row effects to wide soft-tied girdles of self fabric play their part in achieving coats of distinction.

Button fastening is another accent placed on the new models. In fact, the new and ingenious placement of buttons is a study in itself.

One of the newest gestures is the touching up of the coat with a dash of plaid silk. A coat in light navy, for instance, detailed with a plaid silk scarf collar with plaid facing the elbow-depth cuffs is as nifty as one may hope to see. By the way, scarfs must be worn smartly to be chic.

Bright cravat ties are tied close up around the throat, either ascot fashion or in a party bow with long streamers. As a rule, the scarf is set snugly on the inside of the collar.

The chief mission of the scarf is to supply a splash of vivid color.

Two Full Moons in Month

The period of one full moon to another full moon is 29 days 12 hours 44 minutes and 2.87 seconds, or 29.53059 days. When one full moon occurs on the first or second day of the month, there will be another full moon before that month ends. In August, 1929, there were two full moons, one on the first and the other one on the thirtieth.

Peculiar "Beautification"

Native belles of the Sara-Djinges tribe in the Lake Tchad region of Africa stretch their lips for beauty. The process of stretching the lips begins when the girl is about four or five years old, and their lower lips are stretched to the size of an ordinary dinner plate and their upper lips are distended about half as far.

Destroying Troublesome Carpet Beetles

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

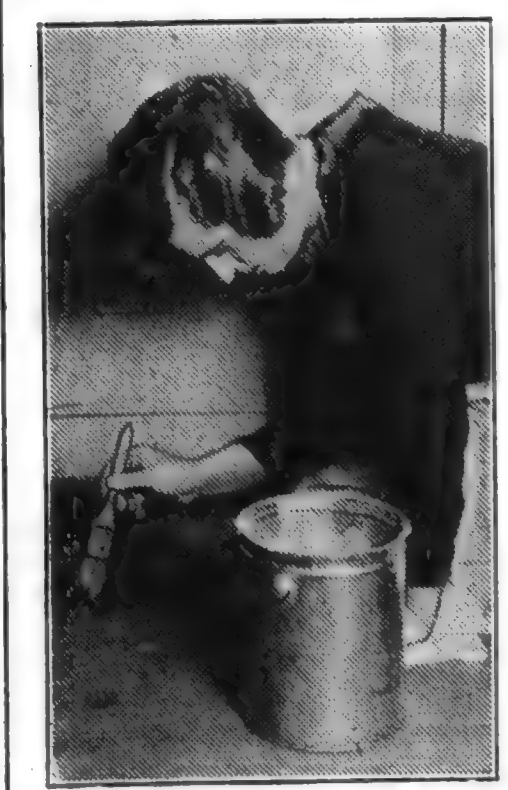

The larva of the carpet beetle or so-called "buffalo moth" is almost as great a nuisance in some parts of the country as that of the clothes moth. It feeds on much the same thing—woolen fabrics, silks, furs, feathers, and hair in upholstered furniture and mattresses. Carpet beetles are possibly less destructive than clothes moths because they reproduce only once a year and less abundantly. Nevertheless they are troublesome when they once get into a house and may even become so generally established that the only remedy is complete fumigation with a satisfactory fumigant. As fumigation should be tried only by some one experienced in handling fumigants, other ways of controlling carpet beetles are suggested by the United States Department of Agriculture.

The young woman in the picture is filling up cracks in the floor with a liquid crack filler. Carpet beetles can live in very small quantities of dust and lint in cracks and corners, and one of the first things to be done to get rid of them is to destroy their hiding places. Kerosene may also be used to drench the cracks and kill any live beetles or larvae that may be lodged in them, but it gives only temporary relief, and the filler should be used if possible to close the cracks entirely.

Rugs, clothes, blankets, and other articles likely to be attacked should be protected from damage in just the same ways as they are protected from clothes moths. They should be thoroughly cleaned and wrapped in tight packages with crystals of naphthalene or paradichlorobenzene, or stored in tight trunks or red cedar chests. Washing in hot soap suds and subsequent ironing will kill any larvae or eggs of the carpet beetle that may be present, but unfortunately this cannot be done to the woolen articles that are most likely to be infested.

Furniture which has become infested should be fumigated, either in the house when the entire house is being fumigated, or in the establishment of some firm which maintains a special fumigation department.

Filling Cracks With Liquid Filler.

Hydrocyanic acid gas is the best known gas for speedily eliminating carpet beetles and other pests that may be present. Where a house has been generally troubled with them, nothing will give greater peace of mind and freedom from worry than one thorough fumigation carried on by a professional fumigator or by an intelligent, careful person capable of following directions.

Evening Fairy Tale for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

"How can I bother about being appreciative when I can't even bother about being affectionate?" asked Mr. Armadillo of his mate.

"In fact," he added, "you are the same way. You can't be affectionate."

"I know," said Mrs. Armadillo. "I heard that we were always far from

"Tell me some of your adventures," being affectionate—it runs in our family.

"I mean that it runs in our family not to be affectionate," said Mr. Armadillo. "I understand you. That's all right," said Mr. Armadillo, in a quiet tone of Armadillo voice.

"I can understand it," said Mrs.

Armadillo. "Our bodies are covered with a hard, hard shell—even our tails are hard."

"Tails?" repeated Mr. Armadillo. "We haven't more than one tail apiece."

"I wasn't speaking of one of us alone—I was speaking of many of us," said Mrs. Armadillo.

"We have more than one tail among a lot of us—we each have our own tail."

"That's so," agreed Mr. Armadillo. "You are quite right, only you talk so queerly."

They did not talk for a moment or two.

Then Mrs. Armadillo said:

"Tell me some of your adventures."

She felt that he would be cheered up if he talked about himself. He had been a little sad lately.

"Ah," he began, "there was the time that I ate a chain. It was a very fine and valuable chain."

"But I thought I would eat a chain as my shell body is covered with rings."

"Of course not the kinds of rings that you wear, but markings that look like rings."

"I've always felt that it was as fine as belonging to a jewelry store to have the rings I have—even if they are so very different."

"Perhaps a jewelry store would like to get hold of some different kinds of rings, but they won't get hold of mine."

"Then there was another time that I ate some birds—and another time I ate some animals."

"Oh yes, I've had some fine and splendid meals in my life."

"Speaking of meals," said Mrs. Armadillo, "wouldn't you like a meal of choice berries today?"

"Would I?" exclaimed Mr. Armadillo delightedly. "Have you some? I'm sure no one would relish and enjoy and appreciate them more than I would."

So Mrs. Armadillo gave him a splendid meal of very choice berries and he was simply delighted.

WOUNDED BOB WHITE

Oh, cruel is the thoughtless deed That wounds another without need.

SQUATTING under the brown dead leaves which had blown into the doorway of the old house made long ago in the wheat field of Farmer Jones by Johnny Chuck was one of the children of Bob White. Tears filled his eyes, tears of fright and pain. He tried to wink them back and to think what he should do next, but he was too bewildered to think. To be bewildered is to be so upset that you cannot understand what has happened or is happening. It was just so with this little Bob White.

With his brothers and sisters he had been happily picking up his breakfast that beautiful morning. Without the least warning a great dog had threatened to catch him and he had taken to his swift, strong, little wings. As he did so he had not feared. All summer long he had seen two-legged creatures like this one and they had not harmed him. Indeed he had come to look on them as his friends, for had not Farmer Brown's boy watched him and his brothers and sisters day after day, and not once offered to even frighten them? So he had no fear of this one.

Then from the end of that stick pointed at him had leaped fire and smoke. Something had struck him, something had stung, and one of his swift, strong, little wings had become useless so that he fell heavily to the ground. Then he had run swiftly until he found this hiding-place, and, with his little heart going pit-a-pat, pit-a-pat with terror, had squatted close under the friendly brown leaves while the great dog and the two-legged creature had looked for him. Now they had given him up and gone away. At least he could not hear them.

What did it all mean? Why had this dreadful thing happened to him? What had he done that the two-legged creature should try to kill him with that terrible fire-stick? Was it any wonder that he was so bewildered? Outside the day was as beautiful as ever, but all the joy of it was gone. Instead it was filled with terror. What should he do now? What could he do? Where were his father and mother and brothers and sisters? Were such dreadful things happening to them as had happened to him? Would he ever see them again?

Presently he heard a far away whistle of his father, Bob White. He was calling his family together. Then he heard answering whistles and he knew that the others were safe and would soon join Bob White. But he did not dare answer himself. He crawled to the doorway and peeped out. He could see the great dog and the cruel two-legged creature with the terrible fire-stick far away on the other side of the field. He tried to leap into the air and fly as he had been used to doing, but only flopped helplessly. One wing was useless and dragged on the ground. It hurt so that the pain made him feel dreadfully faint.

He closed his eyes and lay still for a few minutes panting. Then a new thought filled him with another terrible fear. If Reddy Fox or Old Man Coyote or Redtail the Hawk should happen along how could he escape without the use of his wings? If only he were not alone! If only he could reach his father and mother! Perhaps they could help him. He struggled to his feet and began to walk toward that distant whistle. It was slow work. He was weak and faint and the drooping wing, dragging through the stiff stubble, hurt so that it seemed as if he could not stand it. Often he squatted down and panted with weariness and pain and fright. Then he would go on again. He was terribly thirsty, but there was no water to drink. So at last he crawled under a fence, and then suddenly right in front of him was one of those two-legged creatures! Right then and there the little Bob White gave up all hope.

WHY IS IT "BAGATELLE?"

"OH, NEVER mind, it is only a bagatelle."

This we hear or say every so often, the implication being, "It's only a trifle, don't bother about it."

Like many other words that are now common currency, "bagatelle" comes to us from another tongue in which it has a related but not identical meaning.

It is to the Italian language that we are indebted for "bagatelle." And here, spelled almost exactly as it is spelled in English, it means "a little person."

The Old Gardener Says:

ORIENTAL poppies can be moved safely only in August, at which time they are dormant. Efforts to shift these gorgeous flowering plants in the spring are almost sure to fail but when midsummer comes the tops have died down, and the roots have become almost like leather. Not only can these roots be dug up and moved about at will when in this condition but they can be cut into pieces about two inches long and planted in an inch deep in good soil for the purpose of producing new plants. Almost every piece will grow, and the plants while very young and before they have made taproots, can be transferred to the position they are to occupy in the border.

THE WHY OF SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

DEATH CONTAGION

IN THE rural districts especially, less frequently in the cities, it is the custom, both on this country and Canada, to give the whole house a thorough cleaning after a death has occurred in it, though the death may have been the result of no contagious disease, the deceased may not have had any long illness, and may even have died from violence or accident. The mere fact that death has occurred in the house is supposed to necessitate the cleansing. In some sections many people will not walk through a graveyard in going to make a call for fear of bringing death to their friends.

All this is a survival of the doctrine of the contagion of death. Primitive man had no idea of the contagion of disease but through observation of the effects of disease, came to the conclusion that death itself was "catching." Disease and death to him were purely spiritual phenomena. The nearer the relationship of the dead to the living the more favorably was the living liable to be affected.

If one of the attendants of the temple of Hierapolis-Bambyce saw the dead body of a stranger he might not enter the temple for a day and night; if the body of a relative he was debarred for thirty days and in any case must be purified before resuming his office. In the island of Ceos those who offered sacrifice to dead friends were unclean for two days and could not enter the temple until purified by water. Any number of similar citations might be made. Purification by water was the usual prescription for death contagion; not because of its physically cleansing properties but because it was the ultimate source of life.

Thus we see a primitive idea which has developed on the one hand into boards of health and the germ theory and on the other into a meaningless current superstition.

THE RED CROSS

THE first place among all philanthropic organizations is voted, by common consent, to the Red Cross. It is one of the oldest and certainly the most efficient organization of its kind. It is international in scope and operates in all parts of the world. Among its objects is ministry to those who may be wounded in war, relief of suffering due to floods, sickness, and calamities of all kinds.

The work of the Red Cross during the last war was so efficient and valuable that no person would attempt to estimate its service in terms of statistical tables. In addition to the enormous sum of money expended in hospital equipment, supplies of all kinds, etc., the organization rendered a service of sympathy and compassion toward the sick and wounded that was known only to those who were the recipients of those ministrations. How many lives were saved and bodies healed are records which only the angels keep.

In our own country the Red Cross has rendered a very unique service in the follow-up work among those wounded in the war and has been of unprecedented service upon other occasions, among which was the calamity due to the recent Mississippi floods. Another gigantic task is being handled by the organization in bringing relief to those who are the victims of the recent drought. Only those who visited these districts have any adequate idea of the devastation caused by the drought and the serious need for help.

The appeal of the Red Cross for $10,000,000 is allocated directly to this work; and every person who has shared in that relief work by means of a contribution to that fund should certainly feel that he has rendered most valuable help in a most worthy endeavor.

The Red Cross is a voluntary organization and is dependent for its activities upon free will contributions. It has a very definite claim upon the loyalty and generosity of every American citizen.

BEET BY-PRODUCT HELP FOR LAMBS

Has Several Attributes in Its Bulky Nature.

Wet beet pulp and corn silage make excellent supplements to the lamb-fattening ration because they are bulky, succulent and palatable, and because of their partial grain equivalent value, says E. J. Maynard, associate animal husbandman at the Colorado Agricultural college.

In adding variety to the ration and in reducing the amount of grain necessary for finishing the lambs, these feeds often show a value greater than their actual grain-replacement estimate, it is emphasized.

"Dried molasses beet pulp in recent years has come into rather wide use as whole or partial substitute for grain where lambs have gone 'off feed,'" Maynard adds. "As this beet by-product concentrate has several natural attributes in its bulky nature, its palatability and fattening value, it is often wise to include it as part of the grain mixture fed in the dry ration for lambs when wet pulp or other succulent feed is not available.

"An average of four tests conducted at the Agricultural college indicates that the substitution of dried molasses beet pulp for one-half the corn fed will slightly decrease hay consumption, decrease cost of gains at present prices and slightly increase gains.

"It is a well recognized fact that lambs once 'off feed' on account of too heavy a grain ration can rarely be brought back to a full feed of barley or corn. Since no two bunches of lambs can be expected to take the same amount of grain on a full feed it is often a delicate matter to raise lambs to a full feed of straight grain and hold them there.

"When lambs go 'off feed' the cost of fattening them of course increases because time is lost and digestive disturbances naturally cut down the efficiency with which they handle their ration. Then, too, there may be some death loss experienced in connection with the disturbance.

"With these facts in mind the importance of keeping lambs 'on feed' is evident and any feed that can be used in the fattening ration to safeguard them against going off feed should have additional merit in connection with its actual fattening value."

Right Mineral Mixture in Swine Feeding Lot

The veteran experimental feeder at the Iowa experiment station, John M. Eppard, has the following to say about a simple mineral mixture for pigs:

"It is surprising how well a simple mineral mixture will usually respond in the swine feeding lot. It is surprising that even common salt may give results that are greatly superior to those obtained where no salt is fed. A simple mixture of salt and wood ashes often yields wonderfully good results. Of course when we use salt and wood ashes we have a mixture that carries a number of essential nutritional elements, chief among which are calcium, potassium, sodium, phosphorus and magnesium.

"A very good, simple 'backbone' mixture which carries the outstandingly important deficiency elements such as are needed to balance up our ordinary feeds may be made up per hundred pounds as follows: Hard wood ashes, 60 pounds; spent bone black or bone charcoal, 25 pounds; common salt, 15 pounds; potassium iodide, 0.02 pounds (two one-hundredths or one-fiftieth of one pound)."

Composition of Wheat and Rye Very Similar

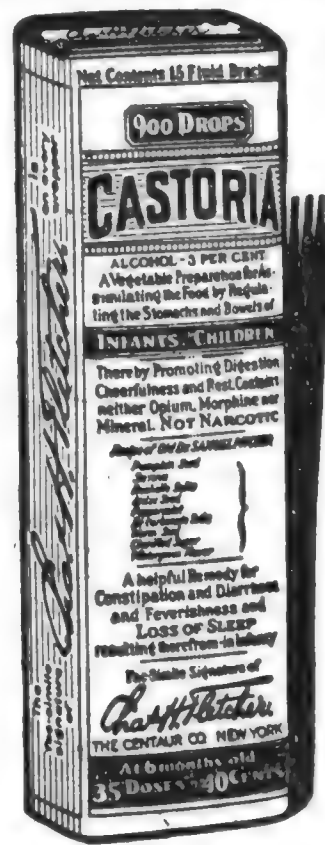

The chemical composition and the general characteristics of wheat and rye are very similar so that they might be expected to give about the same results when fed in the same stations, however, indicate that rye instead of being more valuable than wheat is in reality about 5 per cent less valuable. This difference in feeding value of wheat and rye is thought in a measure at least to be due to the fact that rye is less palatable.

The Minnesota station has recently been working on the problem in an attempt to find out what factors cause rye to be an unsatisfactory feed when it is fed as the greater part of the ration over a period of several weeks or months. Efforts to discover some feed combinations that would be efficient for dry lot conditions have been particularly successful while quite satisfactory results have been obtained by feeding rye combined with other grains upon pasture.

Hay for Horses

An allowance of about one and a half pounds of hay for each 100 pounds of live weight is the usual recommendation for idle horses. Many farmers increase this allowance to two pounds per 100 pounds live weight. This quantity should be divided into two or three parts and fed morning and night with a noon feed if needed. Some horses will eat much more hay than this even when idle, but the tendency is to develop what is often called "hay belly."

Any COLD

That cold may lead to something serious, if neglected. The time to do something for it is now. Don't wait until it develops into bronchitis. Take two or three tablets of Bayer Aspirin as soon as you feel a cold coming on. Or as soon as possible after it starts. Bayer Aspirin will head off or relieve the aching and feverish feeling—will stop the headache. And if your throat is affected, dissolve two or three tablets in a quarter-glassful of warm water, and gargle. This quickly soothes a sore throat and reduces inflammation and infection. Read proven directions for neuralgia, for rheumatism and other aches and pains. Genuine Bayer Aspirin is harmless to the heart.

Comedy of Sentiment in Three Acts

When the last of Miranda Peasley's Nieces is married, the dear old lady realizes that for the first time in all her life she is quite alone in the world. Caring for her sisters daughters has never quite satisfied the powerful mother instinct in her heart and she prays that in some way she may find a boy to care for. Jerry, a city outcast, breaks into her home to steal, and in this she sees an answer to her prayer. How she awakens the finer side of his nature, trusts him and defends him when all the world seems bent on his ruin, how he repays the steadfast devotion of "Mother Mine", affords an absorbing story rich in comedy and with many beautiful touches of exalted sentiment.

Formation of Tree "Rings"

It is well known that the growth of a tree in diameter is shown in the so-called "rings" of annual growth. These rings are simply the material that is added around the tree underneath the bark each year. The outer cells just inside the bark make up the living, active portion of the tree and each year's product is plainly marked off from that of the preceding year. It is in this manner that the rings are formed.

Lesson for March 15

JESUS AMONG FRIENDS AND FOES

GOLDEN TEXT—Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you.
LESSON TEXT—Luke 10:38-42; 11:14-15

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Among His Friends
JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus' Test of Friendship
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Friendship With Jesus
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Dealing With Friend and Foe

1. Jesus in the Home of Friends (Luke 10:38-42).

There is no place where true character is so clearly revealed as at home. 1. His reception (v. 38). Jesus was received by Martha, as she was the head of the home. Jesus must have greatly appreciated the fact that there was one home in which he was welcome.

2. Mary sitting at Jesus' feet (v. 39). She, with fine spiritual discernment, knew that sitting at the Lord's feet and hearing his word was that which would most please him. He was more concerned with opportunity to reveal himself to human hearts than with the eating of well prepared meals. Mary's way of entertaining Jesus was more acceptable than that of Martha.

3. Martha, cumbered about much serving (v. 40). Both sisters loved the Lord. It would be impossible to say which loved the more, but Martha was bent on providing a fine meal for him. Because she was trying to do so many things, she was on the verge of distraction, and found fault with Jesus for permitting Mary to leave the kitchen to listen to his teaching.

4. Jesus' answer (vv. 41, 42). (a) He rebuked Martha (v. 41). He did this most tenderly for he knew that she loved him sincerely. (b) Defends Mary (v. 42). He declared that but one thing was needful and that Mary had chosen that good part, which could not be taken away from her. The one thing needful for every member of the race is a heart for the Lord which brings the individual to Jesus to hear his teaching.

II. Jesus Among Foes (11:14-15).

1. Charged with being in league with the devil (vv. 14-15). Being unwilling to receive him as the Son of God and yet unable to account for his mighty works, they declared that he was casting out demons through Beelzebub, the chief of the demons.

2. Refusal to believe his miracles (vv. 20-22). They asked for a sign to which he replied that they would have a sign from heaven in his death and resurrection. He reminded them, however, that their request showed unbelief surpassing that of the heathen queen of the South and the wicked people of Nineveh.

3. Wickedness denounced (vv. 37-54). He pronounced six woes upon those who were opposing him and seeking his destruction: three upon the Pharisees and three upon the lawyers.

a. The Pharisees (vv. 37-41). These he denounced for:

(1) Punctiliously observing minute rites while at the same time breaking the Ten Commandments. They carefully tithed the small herbs of the garden while practicing injustices with their fellow men and withholding love from God. He pointed out to them their attending to these external acts while their hearts were filled with wickedness. It was as absurd as merely washing the outside of an unclean cup.

(2) Desire for public recognition (v. 43). This is a common sin today. Love for titles of respect and positions of prominence is a very common sin.

(3) Feigning humility (v. 44). He compared their hypocrisy to graves which are on the ground and may be stepped upon unconsciously by some one who would thus be defiled.

b. The lawyers (vv. 45-54). The strictures of Jesus on the hypocritical Pharisees aroused the lawyers, one of whom indignantly declared, "Thou reproachest us also." In reply to this Christ pronounced three woes upon them:

(1) For placing burdensome requirements upon the people to which they themselves would not submit (v. 46). Religious rites should not be made irksome. (2) For the murder of God's prophets (v. 47-51). He showed that their attitude toward him was the same as was shown to the prophets by their fathers. Jesus declared that their guilt was the same as that of their fathers and that their generation would be held responsible for all that the fathers had done. (3) For keeping back the knowledge of God by false interpretations of the Scripture (v. 52-54).

New Fillings Needed

God forbid that any of you should think that two months from now you can work in the power of the filling you receive today. A new filling is needed for each new emergency of Christian service.—R. A. Torrey.

Obedience

Obedience is the great organ of understanding Christ. When we do his will we shall understand him and when we understand him we shall become like him.—Exchange.

Differences in Halos

In art the nimbus, or halo of light encircling the head of Christ, is usually of gold, enriched with a cross—a triangular nimbus for the Father, a square one for a person still living, and disk or disk-shaped for a saint or martyr.

INDIGESTION GOES—QUICKLY, PLEASANTLY

When you suffer from heartburn, gas or indigestion, it's usually too much acid in your stomach. The quickest way to stop your trouble is with Phillips' Milk of Magnesia. A spoonful in water neutralizes many times its volume in stomach acids—Instantly. The symptoms disappear in five minutes.

Try Phillips' Milk of Magnesia, and you will never again allow yourself to suffer from over-acidity again. It is the standard anti-acid with doctors. Your drugstore has Phillips' Milk of Magnesia, with directions for use, in generous 25c and 50c bottles.

Avoid Burns from Mustard Plasters

When you have Rheumatic or Muscular Pains in the back, chest or limbs or if you have a cold coming on, try this simple treatment. It is more convenient, safer, cleaner and more effective than mustard plaster.

Get a bottle of Hoff's Liniment and apply it with brisk rubbing. Then saturate a cloth with Hoff's and apply to the painful area and in a few minutes you will feel the warming and stimulating effect of this powerful liniment.

Hoff's is different from ordinary liniments that are applied with rubbing alone. It brings a quick flow of blood to the affected area, reducing congestion and relieving pain. Get an eight ounce bottle of your druggist today for 60 cents. If you do not get relief in 30 minutes he is authorized to refund your money. Goodrich-Gamble Company, St. Paul, Minnesota.

ALL MASH FOR CHICKS

(By Jos. H. Bodwell)

Did you ever notice the difference in temperament of a team of horses when worked, and when idle? If they are worked steadily every day they are quiet and peaceful, but give them a lot of rest and they become uneasy, nip one another, paw and kick the stall they are in. In fact, sometimes they become vicious and actually bite one another.

This same principal holds true with chicks. If they have a chance to become idle they will pick at one another and cannibalism will develop much more rapidly than if they are kept busy at all times.

If they have access to scratch grains their crops become filled up quicker and it takes longer for the scratch grains to digest than it does for mash. Consequently, they will have many more idle hours during the day where scratch grains are fed than when the all mash system is used.

Another advantage of the all mash system is that there is more protein present and more different types of protein and also the animal source of protein is present in the all mash, whereas in scratch grain there is no animal source whatever. In order for baby chicks to grow rapidly and to feather quickly, many sources of protein must be available for the chick and a much more economical growth will be had where both the animal source and vegetable source are present.

Again in the mash more mineral will be present than will be the case of scratch. Where dried buttermilk or skim milk is mixed in with the mash it enables the chickens to get their source of milk much more evenly than in any other way. This also is a wonderful source of vitamins for the baby chicks and helps to give the succulence which would not be secured if only scratch grains were fed.

To sum up the advantages of an all mash system: It keeps the chicks busier throughout the day; it supplies the chicks with many sources of proteins; it enables a better distribution to the chicks of milk and the vitamins it contains and, furthermore, it insures a better distribution to the chicks of the minerals which are so essential for uniform growth.

REVIVING THE BASE BALL SPIRIT IN ST. JOE

Regardless of the snow that has been playing havoc, a few of the warmer blooded base-ball followers met in the "old town hall" last Friday eve to organize a base ball team.

A committee of Spencerville and St. Joe fans and players met together and decided to combine the two teams for the 1931 season.

This has long been advised and sponsored by fans from both towns and is now a certainty. With the combining of the two teams there is no reason why a good team can not be had, one that both towns can take pride in supporting.

Wm. Goldsmith was elected manager with Walter Zonker acting as assistant manager. Mr. Zonker does not want to take an active part this season but was voted in over his veto. The team wishes to thank him for his loyal work for the past few seasons, and hope he gets into uniform for a few games.

All plans for the season have been postponed until a week from next Friday night, at which time plans will be completed.

There are two things bothering the organization at this time: a name for the team, and getting Bruce Blair back for this season.

We need a name for the team, because any combination of St. Joe-Spencerville is unsatisfactory. If anyone has a suggestion, let's hear of it via the St. Joe News.

Also if anyone has any influence with Bruce get busy and use it for Butler is pulling hard for him.

You are invited to the meeting a week from Friday night.

—Wm. G.

DAIRY CALF CLUBS HELP IMPROVE HERD BREEDING

Since there has been a slump in the prices of dairy products, the farmer should not conclude that nothing can be done to relieve this condition. Prices can be helped back to normal levels if all those interested will lend a hand in solving local problems of production and marketing.

The value and need of the efficient and high-producing dairy cow has never been more forcibly brought to our attention than during the past year. Past and present conditions indicate that better cows are needed in dairy herds, rather than more cows.

There is a plan that should be taken advantage of this year in spite of the prices of dairy products that will help establish better herds and more profits from smaller herds.

The Calf Club project of Purdue University offers a solution in establishing better foundation herds for the future, toward which all interested dairymen are working.

Through the plan of this project registered dairy heifers can be purchased locally from reliable breeders whose herds are free from disease and who have been following a constructive program of development.

The question of finance is, perhaps, the most important consideration now. However, the sale of one or two low-producing or inferior cows will not only help solve the surplus production problem but will be a means of securing a promising, well-bred, registered heifer to place in the hands of a deserving boy or girl. Those who need better dairy cattle and those who are interested in better foundation stock should take advantage of present conditions.

There is one conclusion many have made, and many more will make in the future, that better dairy cows are and will be needed if profits are going to be produced for the dairyman, even under normal conditions.

A Calf Club sponsored by Jersey Cattle Club is being organized in this county. Any one interested in this project can obtain further information from the County Agent.

PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY BILL SIGNED BY GOVERNOR

Indianapolis, Ind. March 18, 1931. Governor Leslie today signed the "Personal Responsibility Bill" sponsored by the motor clubs in Indiana. This is a matter of far-reaching importance and protection to automobile owners, according to the Hoosier State Automobile Ass'n., as they issued the following statement.

"There are two big outstanding features to this new law. In the first place, these automobiles that are driven on the highways and are in such poor condition that they can hardly be controlled, and are usually driven by some one whose mental attitude and driving ability is about as bad as the automobile, are in the future, going to be up against some additional requirements. For instance, when they do such outlandish driving as to call for the revocation of their driver's license of when they cause damage in excess of $100.00 and judgment is rendered against them, they must, if they are going to drive in the future, provide some degree of reasonable financial responsibility. If they are such drivers that they cannot get an ordinary insurance policy they still have two more chances—one is to provide a cash bond and the other a satisfactory personal bond. If they cannot do any of these three things they are simply out of luck on driving in the future until they do provide such financial responsibility.

"We believe that these safeguarding provisions will cause a lot of people to be more careful to keep their automobiles in satisfactory condition to be driven on the public highways as well as to be more careful to drive with due consideration and observance of traffic laws for the simple reason that they will recognize if they do not do these things they are very likely to be unable to drive an automobile at all in the future.

"The second big outstanding reason for this measure is that the great majority of people are entitled to some degree of financial responsibility against this small minority of incompetent, inconsiderate and criminally careless class of drivers.

"Two years ago we succeeded in getting a bill of this character passed, but it was not as well worked out as the present act. Twelve states in the United States now have, in large part or all, this same law, and more than one half the motorists of Canada are driving under these provisions. This Bill, known as the "Personal Responsibility Bill," is sponsored by the motor clubs throughout the United States and Canada banded together as a part of the American Automobile Association.

ESCAPE FIRE IN FRAT HOUSE AT LAFAYETTE

Fire of undetermined origin swept the Delta Alpha Pi Fraternity house at Purdue University Saturday morning, routing thirty-eight members and pledges from their beds in the dormitory clad only in pajamas and dressing robes.

The fire started in one corner of the basement and was not discovered until it had gained considerable headway. Flames swept through the three stories of one wing of the frame structure. Damage was estimated at $30,000 partially covered by insurances.

Delta Alpha Pi is the only fraternity on the campus that does not permit smoking.

The students, all of whom lost their clothing in the blaze, were taken to the Sigma Pi and Triangles Fraternities and with aid from other organizations were fitted with clothes and given food.

Frank Miser was among the boys losing their personal belongings. Ed Miser and son, Charles, immediately drove to Lafayette to see that Frank was taken care of and that he was again fitted with clothing.

Frank was sleeping on the second floor and the boys took sheets and tied them together and let themselves to the ground.

OBITUARY

Charles Foltz, son of Samuel and Margaret Foltz, was born on November 19, 1873 at Leipsic, Ohio. He departed from this earthly life March 14, 1931 at the age of 57 years, 3 months and 25 days.

When he was a boy his father died, and until 1926 when his mother died he had been under her loving and sacrificial care. From 1926 he has shared in the love and kindness of the J. P. Buckingham home.

From the age of two years when he suffered an attack of brain fever he has needed special care, and especially during the past year when his health has failed rapidly. His life brought blessings to those with whom he lived, and to those who knew him. He taught patience, thankfulness, trust, love and interest in others all of which are qualities in the Kingdom of Heaven.

He is survived by three brothers and four sisters: Monroe Foltz, of Cleveland, Ohio; Clyde Foltz, of Miller City, Ohio; Joseph Foltz, of St. Joe, Mrs. Viola Roos of Lima, Ohio; Mrs. Mary Hiltner, of Continental, Ohio; Mrs. C. C. Phipps, of Los Angeles, California and Mrs. Lillian Buckingham of St. Joe.

Funeral services were conducted from the home on Tuesday at 12:00 o'clock. Rev. G. D. Stoll officiating, assisted by Rev. and Mrs. A. K. Mumma, of Leipsic, Ohio for burial.

CARD OF THANKS

To our friends and neighbors—who gave to us, all that human kindness could suggest for help and comfort in this, our dark hour of sorrow—and whose tender solicitation never wavered through the years that our departed loved one shared our home, after being bereft of the care and devotion of a mother's tender love. Our hearts feel the deepest gratitude for this devoted friendship, which softens the sad memories that linger round the vacant chair. So, to you, our friends and neighbors—we extend our sincerest and heartfelt thanks. May the day be far distant when your hearts may need balm for similar sorrow, but should it come, may you receive the same full measure of generous aid and tender sympathy that throws the pure light of unselfish friendship into a darkened home.

Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Buckingham
Brothers and Sisters.

OBITUARY

Mary D. Rush Buchanan, daughter of William and Jamimah (Rigby) Rush, wife of Florence Buchanan, was born November 23, 1844 at Royalton, Fairfield County, Ohio. When about five years of age her parents moved to Auburn, DeKalb County, Indiana. She was the second child in a family of eleven all of whom have preceded her in death except one sister, Mrs. Martha J. Dawson, of Boise, Idaho.

She was married to Florence Buchanan March 21, 1870. Last year they celebrated their Sixtieth wedding anniversary. To them three children were born, one son, Harry L., and two daughters, Martha F. and Florence J., all of whom survive her.

She was educated in the city schools of Auburn and taught in the same four years also taught five years in the district schools of DeKalb and Steuben counties. Her life was one of constant activity. By temperament she did not seek the path of ease but rather that of service ever interested in the public affairs of her community. Possessing a mind of unusual ability she kept herself informed on all matters of public interest, was a correspondent to the Auburn Dispatch and the St. Joe News. She was a member of the W. C. T. U. and Culture Club of St. Joe.

When a girl she made her choice, the Christian life, accepted Christ as her Savior and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church in Auburn, remaining a member of this church until she moved to Concord in the year 1876 where she transferred to the Methodist Protestant Church and in the year 1905 moved to St. Joe where she transferred into the Methodist Protestant Church and was an effective member until her death. One of her pleasures in life was the work she was able to do for the Church, while interested in all its work she was most active in the Sunday School where she taught a class from girlhood until just a few years ago when compelled to cease because of infirmities of old age.

September 27, 1928 she suffered the misfortune of a fall which fractured her hip, from which she never recovered. About two years ago she came with her husband to the home of her daughter, Mrs. W. F. Rhoads in Fort Wayne, Indiana. Here she was made as comfortable as loving care could provide, yet she suffered much, but she who had always been patient and kind grew, under this affliction, more saintly with the perfection of these virtues until she quietly slipped from the experience of mortality into that of immortality, Sunday morning, March 8, 1931. Her translation came as if in answer to the call of the chimes and church bells that were then ringing, to call the people to worship. She answered them, although not to join her friends here, as her habit was, but to join the innumerable host of the redeemer who surround the white throne of life.

HICKSVILLE HATCHERY

Quality and Price are two things to be considered in buying chicks this season. We have carefully culled our flocks, treated them for worms, and are dipping to eggs in Iodine Suspension to prevent all germ of Coccidiosis which may occur on the shell. This with low prices of Baby Chicks, should insure a profitable dividend for those who purchase chicks at the Hicksville Hatchery.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Good posture should be maintained during the whole of the twenty-four hours, in standing, sitting, walking, sleeping, working, and playing. Extension workers of the United States Department of Agriculture and state agricultural colleges are constantly showing farm women through home demonstration clubs, the effects of good and bad posture, and the points that characterize good posture at any occupation.

It may be thought that because one knows nothing about what is going on during the hours devoted to sleep, and because the body is in a relaxed state, that posture while sleeping has no connection with posture during the waking hours. When it is realized, however, that seven or eight hours out of every twenty-four are usually spent sleeping or lying on a bed, and Whenever Mr. Crow was feeling sad and mournful, as he sometimes felt, Mrs. Crow always treated him as though he were a child crow instead of a grownup Mr. Crow.

"They still put the scarecrows in their fields; they still do," he said.

"You mean those creatures made out of sticks and things which are dressed up like men with guns, eh?" asked Mrs. Crow.

"Yes, they are called scarecrows," said Mr. Crow. "They are put in the fields to scare away the crows, and that is why they have such a name—you see—scarecrows, or let us scare the crows."

"It's foolish of them," said Mrs. Crow. "We may not be perfect but we have our good points."

that no other occupation of the twenty-four hours keeps a person in one place for any period as long as this, the importance of sleeping in a good position, which will improve the posture in the daytime, is quite easily perceptible.

Sagging bed springs can do a great deal of harm. Whether the person sleeping on them lies on the back on the side, the tendency is to produce an unnatural curve in the spine, and if the same position is always maintained, this may become permanent. The shoulders and hips are also thrown out of position on a bed that sags down in the middle, or that causes one unconsciously to twist about in order to be comfortable. Another less direct effect of bed springs on bodily posture is caused by fatigue. One does not rest well in an uncomfortable position, and when the muscles and joints are tired, posture is affected unconsciously.

Evening Story for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

"Yes," said Mr. Crow, "we have. It is true that we do steal the grain and corn."

"We love corn—all crows do."

"And many of us are thieves—in fact, most of us are thieves, I believe. "But we must eat and we must live, and if we can't go to the markets and put down pennies, and nickels, and dimes, and quarters for our food, we just have to take it as we can."

"Yes," Agreed Mrs. Crow.

"We can't shop as people can. We have no money, no pocketbooks, no bank accounts at our disposal. "The squirrels have savings banks where they save nuts as children do their pennies."

"But we are without all these things. Nor can we grow food as the farmer can do."

"So it makes me sad to hear myself complained of all the time. As you have said, we have our good points. "Although I will admit that our family does steal and that we do rob the farmer of some goodies—all the harm we do doesn't half come up to the good we do."

"We eat grubs and different kinds of worms which would destroy the corn, and we really save the crops for the farmer many, many times."

"Yes," agreed Mrs. Crow, "what you say is true. And I do wish you would take some comfort knowing that you have good points."

"And, too, you are such a good mate, and so kind to the children, that I think everything of you."

"Caw, caw," said Mr. Crow. "That is indeed pleasant to hear. Caw, caw, I think that is fine."

So Mrs. Crow comforted him a great deal, and they spent a lovely afternoon talking about their good points. It was a fine subject and they enjoyed it immensely. And I can understand that, can't you?

Steamed Pudding Substantial Dessert

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

On winter days a steamed pudding often appeals to those members of the household who like a substantial dessert. For most people hot puddings are most enjoyable when the dings are not too filling. They should not be planned for the end of a rich, heavy dinner. The following recipe for steamed cranberry pudding is from the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture:

2 cups cranberries 1/2 cup butter or 1/2 cup sifted soft other fat
1/2 cup wheat flour 1/2 cup sugar
1 tsp. baking powder 2 eggs
1/4 tsp. salt 1/2 cup milk

Pick over, wash and dry the cranberries and roll them in two table-spoonfuls of the flour. Sift the rest of the flour with the baking powder and salt. Cream the fat, add the sugar and well-beaten eggs, and add to the dry ingredients alternately with the milk. Fold in the cranberries, turn into a buttered mold, cover, and steam for two hours. Serve hot with sauce made as follows:

1 cup sugar 2 cups cranber-
1 tbs. cornstarch rice
1/4 tsp. salt 2 or 4 tbs. butter
2 cups boiling water

Mix the sugar, cornstarch and salt. Add two cups of boiling water, stir until thickened and cook for ten minutes in a double boiler. Meanwhile, cook the cranberries with one cup of water for ten minutes. Press them through a fine sieve and add this pulp to the cornstarch mixture. Add the butter and serve hot over the hot cranberry pudding.

Cranberry pie is another delicious dessert. The crust should be pre-baked before the cranberries and other ingredients are put in.

2 cups cranberries 1 1/2 cups water
1 1/2 cups sugar 1 tbs. butter or
2 tbs. cornstarch other fat
1/4 tsp. salt Pastry

Wash and pick over the berries and discard any imperfect ones. Mix thoroughly the sugar, cornstarch, and salt, add the water and cook over direct heat for four minutes; then add the butter and cranberries, stir and cook the fruit for a few minutes. Pour into a partially baked crust and put alternate strips of this pastry over the top of the berries. Bake about 20 minutes at 400 degrees Fahrenheit, or until the strips are lightly brown.

Save Unnecessary Steps in the Kitchen

In planning a kitchen arrangement, grouping utensils and equipment at the places where they will actually be used, will save many unnecessary steps and motions. Why walk ten feet across a kitchen and back again to get the bread knife if the bread box is kept in another part of the room?

Good Things for the Family to Eat

By NELLIE MAXWELL

"This world is a difficult world indeed, and people are hard to suit. For the man who plays the violin, is a bore to the man with a flute."

Soups are enjoyed in any season. There is such a variety of canned soups from which to choose that the busy housewife or business woman may serve herself and family a different soup every day of the month.

The home prepared soups of fresh meat and bones with plenty of marrow are much more enjoyed when nicely prepared. Long, slow cooking, with meat and bones put on in cold water to draw out all the flavor, will give a most tasty and nourishing broth. Adding rice, barley, or vegetables of different kinds will vary the flavor as well as the enjoyment. To prepare and serve a good vegetable soup is an accomplishment which is worthy of praise.

Tons of American confections go to every part of the world. From America last year from June, 1920, to June, 1921, eighteen million pounds of candy were shipped. The world is growing conscious of the value of candy.

The scientist of the United States Naval observatory who went to the Pacific island of Niunou to see the total eclipse of the sun have proved that lollipops are a valuable asset in gaining the confidence and help of savage tribes. Since money means nothing to such semi-barbaric people, candy buys their good will.

A box of candy is always a most appreciated gift from youth to very old age.

Peanut Brittle.—One may make candy in her own home; it is not much work nor does it take a great deal of skill to make the pan candies. Take a pound of peanuts, shell, remove the brown husks and roll with a rolling pin until the nuts are like coarse crumbs. Take one pound of sugar, place in a thick iron or heavy aluminum pan over heat and stir until the sugar is well melted, stirring well from the sides of the pan. Add the nut meats with one-fourth of a teaspoonful of salt, mix well and pour onto a buttered baking sheet.

Creamy Fudge.—Place three cups of sugar, one-fourth cupful of sirup, one-half cupful of milk, two squares of chocolate cut fine, in a saucepan and stir over a slow fire until the sugar is dissolved and the chocolate melted. Cover and cook one minute, remove the cover and cook without stirring until a soft ball is formed in cold water, 238 F. Add two tablespoonfuls of cooking oil, half a teaspoonful of salt, and one teaspoonful of vanilla. Set into cold water, cool until the mixture is barely warm, then beat until creamy and it loses its shine. Pour into well-buttered pans and mark off into squares.

Icing.—Into a double boiler place one and three-fourths cupfuls of sugar, add one-third of a cupful of boiling milk; when the sugar is dissolved add one teaspoonful of lemon juice and one-half teaspoonful of baking powder, and the last thing, after adding two unbeat whites of egg and beaten with an egg beater over hot water until the egg is slightly thick, add the lemon juice and baking powder after the saucepan is removed from the heat. When cool enough to spread add coconut and served on the cake.

Put a tablespoonful of salt and a tablespoonful of soda in an aluminum saucepan, cover with hot water and immerse your flat iron when needed cleaning. It will remove the tarnish in a few moments.

Oklahoma Oil

Several small oil fields existed in what was known as Indian territory, but it was not until the Bartlesville field was developed in 1903-4 and the building of the Prairie Oil and Gas company pipeline into that district—followed immediately by extension of the line to Chicago—that Oklahoma began to have a marked effect in oil production.

Fur Used Like Fabric on New Coats

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

As to fur or no fur on the spring coat, it is entirely a matter of preference. The fact that many of the smartest furs are as supple, as lightweight and as easy to manipulate as the fabrics they trim has accomplished wonders in doing away with the prejudice which may have existed with some in regard to fur trims in the balmy springtime and now they can be worn any time.

Indications are that there will be as many fur-trimmed coats seen this spring as unfurred. In order to be distinguished looking, however, the fur must be styled along entirely new and original lines. Smart in every detail is the fur-collared and cuffed coat which is here illustrated. Rita La Roy of Radio pictures, who poses for this illustration, wears this model with its wide cuffs and generous collar of beige lapin to perfection.

As to fur cuffs you never can tell these days where they will end and the sleeve begin. Nevertheless, regardless of the fact that most of the sleeve in this instance is fur, owing to the extreme thickness of the fur there is nothing bulky or ungainly about it. Notice the diagonal fastening of this coat, also the adroit seaming of the cloth.

Fashion is particularly kind to the woman who is apt one day to be in a mood to wear fur on her coat and the next day wishes her spring wrap were one of the new sort without an inch of fur on it. The problem has been worked out very cleverly via adjustable collars which are so fashioned that cunningly devised scarfs of the flat fur are made to be pulled through slots in the cloth, or perhaps the fur buttonholes, the same to be slipped over decorative buttons on the coat.

Which brings us to a vastly important subject, that of buttons on the new coats. Double-breasted coats which call attention to two rows of big buttons are the "last word" for spring. Coats which button in a single row down the front are also good style, and will be worn by many this spring.

CHILDREN NEED STORM-PROOF PLAY CLOTHES

This Suit Takes Place of Overcoat, Sweater and Leggings.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

The winter play suit illustrated was carried out in a new, shower-proof, wind-proof cotton fabric. The intention is to shut out wind and rain or snow so that a child dressed in one of these suits and galoshes can play out of doors in any weather. Several pattern companies have patterns that can be adapted to the special features of this play suit, which was designed by the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture.

The straight collar fits snugly up to the neck. A soft knitted collar may be used equally well. The sleeves are straight, and have the width at the wrist confined by a loop and button. This is a good plan when a sweater is worn underneath as the close-knit wristband of the sweater will keep out wind.

Part of the fullness of the legs is taken out by a dart extending from the knee to the bottom. This leaves less bulk to be disposed of under the galoshes. Patch pockets with one corner turned down and caught by a button are placed near the waistline in a convenient position for the child. The upper edge of the pockets is cut on a slant so that child can get his hand into them easily.

A suit of this kind takes the place of an overcoat, sweater, and leggings.

Meat Substitute

Cheese is an excellent meat substitute because it is rich in protein and fat and contains calcium, phosphorus, and vitamin A.

FAMOUS Doctor's Way to move the Bowels

Do your bowels fail you occasionally? Are you a chronic sufferer from constipation and its ills? Then you will be interested to know of this method which makes the bowels help themselves.

Dr. Caldwell specialized on bowel ills. He treated thousands for constipation. The prescription he wrote so many times—which has been tested by 47 years' practice—can be had of any drugstore today. Its pleasant taste and the way it acts have made it the world's largest selling laxative.

"Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin," as it is called, is a skillful compound of laxative herbs, pure pepsin and other mild ingredients. Nothing in it to harm even a baby. Children like its taste. It acts gently, without griping or discomfort. So it is ideal for women or older people. But even the most robust man will find its action thorough, satisfying. The quick, certain benefits millions are securing from Syrup Pepsin prove a doctor knows what is best for the bowels.

Next time you feel bilious, head-achy, bloated, gassy, or constipated take some Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin and see how fine you feel the next day—and for days to come!

"Little Stories for Bedtime"

by Thornton W. Burgess

FARMER BROWN'S BOY

You cannot always surely tell if things be ill or things be well.

WHEN the poor suffering wounded little Bob White crawled under the fence he didn't know it but he had crawled onto the land of Farmer Brown and a sign warned him to keep off—that no shooting would be allowed there. And when that poor little Bob White looked up and saw right in front of him one of those two-legged creatures like the one with the terrible fire-stick, and at once had given up all hope, he had been too sick at heart and suffering too much to recognize Farmer Brown's boy.

But that is just who it was. You see Farmer Brown's boy had been so anxious for fear that some hunter would come over on his father's land in spite of the signs that he had gone down on the Green Meadows just as soon as he had eaten his breakfast. He had seen the hunter on the land of Farmer Jones and had heard him shoot. With all his heart Farmer Brown's boy had hoped that the hunter had missed. Now as he looked down and saw the poor little suffering bird he knew that the hunter had not missed and fierce anger swelled his heart. He quite forgot that he himself used to hunt with a terrible gun before he had learned to know and to love the little people of the Green Meadows and the Green Forest.

"Hello!" Exclaimed the Hunter, "Guess That's My Bird."

He stooped and very tenderly lifted the little Bob White, who closed his eyes and was sure that now all would soon be over.

"You poor little thing. You poor, poor little thing," said Farmer Brown's boy as he looked at the torn and broken wing. Then he looked across at the hunter and scowled savagely. Just then the hunter saw him and at once started toward him. You see the hunter thought that perhaps if he offered Farmer Brown's boy money he would allow him to hunt on Farmer Brown's land. He knew that that was where Bob White and all his family had flown to. When he reached the fence he saw the little Bob White in the hands of Farmer Brown's boy.

"Hello!" exclaimed the hunter, in surprise, "I guess that's my bird!" "I guess it's nothing of the sort!" retorted Farmer Brown's boy.

"Oh, yes it is," replied the hunter. "I shot it a little while ago, but it got away from me. I'll thank you to hand it over to me, young man."

"I'll do nothing of the sort," replied Farmer Brown's boy. "It may be the bird you shot, more shame to you. But it isn't yours; it's mine. I found it on our land and it belongs to me if it belongs to any one."

Now the hunter was tempted to reply sharply. But remembering that he wanted to get this boy's permission to hunt on Farmer Brown's land he bit the angry reply off short and said instead: "Why don't you wring its neck? If you'll get your father to let me shoot on your land I'll kill another for you and then you will have a fine dinner."

Farmer Brown's boy grew red in the face. "Don't you dare put your foot on this side of the fence," he cried. "I'd have you to know that these Bob Whites are my very best friends. They've worked for me all summer long, and do you suppose I'm going to let any harm come to them now? If I can help it? Not much! Look how this poor little thing is suffering. The law lets you hunt them, but it's a bad law. If they did any harm it would be different. But instead of doing harm they work for me all summer long and then when the crops which they have helped us save are harvested we turn around and allow them to be shot! But they can't be shot on this land and the sooner you get away the better I'll like it."

Instead of getting angry the hunter laughed good naturedly. "All right, I'll keep off your land, sonny," said he. "But you needn't get so excited. They're only birds and were made to be shot."

"No more than you were!" retorted Farmer Brown's boy. "And they've got feelings just as you have. This poor little thing is trembling like a leaf in my hand. I'm not going to wring its neck. I'm going to try to cure it." With this Farmer Brown's boy turned his back on the hunter and started for home. And the poor little Bob White, not understanding, had no more hope than before.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"FISHING WITH A GOLDEN HOOK"

TO FISH with a golden hook is to fish for more than mere sport. It is usually fishing with a sinister motive, fishing with the idea of luring a treasure, exploiting a franchise, luring a citizenry.

So, fishing with a golden hook, which is a euphemism for offering a bribe, has been in our language a long time.

While we find its earliest recorded use in English in Arthur Brooke's "Tragicall History of Romeus and Juliet" published in 1582, the metaphor originally appeared in the work of the Roman historian, Suetonius, particularly in his De Vita Caesarum; Augustus Octavianus.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

COMPANY ON MONDAY

IF YOU have company on Monday you will have company every day during the week. As perhaps you know, for this superstition is general throughout the United States. It arises from that impulse in man, as old as the race itself, to "seek for a sign" at the beginning of any new enterprise, or the beginning of a new epoch or specified division of time; to "perceive the veil through which we may not see." The savage seeks for a sign from his medicine man before setting out on the warpath, and for this, when the Grecian fleet lay becalmed at Aulis ready to sail for the plains of Troy, did Iphigenia see around her the "stem black-headed kings, waiting to see her die." And the Roman Augustus sought not only for a sign "when the eagles marched to Rimini" but at stated intervals forecast the welfare of the Roman people.

A new enterprise, a new week, must have a sign at its commencement. Though Sunday is really the first day of the week in practice we regard Monday as the week's beginning; and something innate in us makes us regard a happening at the beginning of anything as a prognostic. If you have company on Monday it is "a sign" that you will have company every day of the week.

In some sections of the country people say that if you have company on Sunday—not Monday—you will have company the rest of the week. These people might be called the "strict constructionists."

Wealthy Eskimos

Prosperity appears to be smiling on some members of the so-called submerged races. An official of the Hudson's Bay company reports to Country Home that there are several Eskimo families on its books who make upward of $40,000 a year from the sale of white fox furs.

Their income is no more remarkable than some of their ways of spending it. Each of these aristocratic Eskimo families, for instance, buys coal at $300 a ton. They spend equally large amounts for radio equipment and airplane rides.

For Meditation

By LEONARD A. BARRETT

CONTAGIOUS INFLUENCE

A SPECIALIST in the field of vocational training recently visited a number of American colleges in search of two young persons to fill teaching positions in a foreign country. The qualifications desired for these positions were thorough knowledge of the subject, good academic training, and last, but by no means least, the ability to teach. It was not difficult to find those who possessed the first and second requisite, but those who had the ability to impart the knowledge they possessed were found to be very few in number.

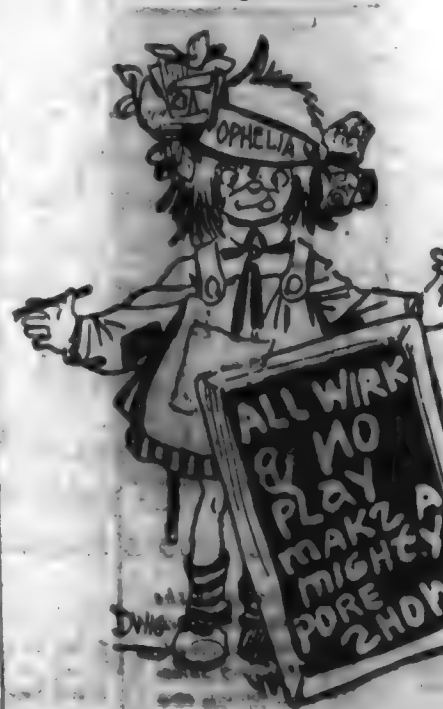

To give to another something that we have ourselves requires not only the possession of the thing itself, but that strange and almost divine gift of making the other person see what we see, feel what we feel, and more important still, believe what we believe. It is one thing to possess knowledge, but the enthusiasm created by it so that you cannot help but desire that others share it with you is quite another thing. The possession of this last qualification is the very essence of success in all of life's endeavors.

The actor cannot gain applause by mere sham or imitation. He must actually live the part in the play if he would impart his enthusiasm to his audience. The same is true of the musician, artist and student.

The man of business is no exception to this law. The psychology of salesmanship, so much exploited these days, is nothing more than the art of convincing the buyer that he needs what the salesman has to offer. If the salesman actually believes what he says he will more likely succeed in making the deal. If he only thinks so, or pretends, or merely acts a part, he will likely fail to make the desired transaction.

The influence of one's faith, in whatever realm of experience it may be, will be contagious the moment it is put into action. It is built upon the same principle. The old saying is very true that a man to have friends must show himself friendly. As nature responds with abundant generosity to our best efforts, so what we give to the people somehow does come back to us. If we sincerely and enthusiastically give our best service and loyalty, we receive the same a hundred fold; especially when that faith and sincerity is so real that it becomes contagious.

LIVE STOCK

GROW SOY BEANS FOR STOCK FEED

Inadvisable to Rely on Them as Whole Protein Source.

For a number of years the acreage of soy beans, grown both for grain and hay, has been increasing. As a result more of the beans have also been fed to live stock as a source of home-grown protein. It is, of course, desirable for the farmer to produce as much protein as possible and thereby reduce the need for the purchase of this constituent to a minimum.

While one can secure economical gains on hogs fed a ration of corn and soy beans or barley and soy beans, yet such rations are not satisfactory because they produce soft pork, which is discriminated against by the packers. That being the case, soy beans should not be employed as a protein supplement for pork production, at any rate not as the sole source of the amount needed for balancing the ration.

Fortunately, however, soy beans may be used as a source of protein in the feeding of brood sows, both during the gestation and the suckling periods, as a test conducted at the Illinois experiment station has clearly shown. Thus two lots of eleven sows each were fed for a period of 95 days between the breeding and farrowing dates—Lot 1 on corn and a protein supplement composed of two parts by weight of tankage and one part by weight of linseed meal, and Lot 2, on corn and whole soy beans containing the same amount of protein as the tankage and linseed meal supplied Lot 1.

The daily average consumption of feed by Lot 1 was 4.1 pounds corn and .51 of a pound of tankage and linseed meal on which they made a daily gain of .53 of a pound per head. Lot 2 consumed an average of 3.7 pounds corn and .73 of a pound of soy beans per head per day. The average weight of both lots of sows at the beginning of the feeding or gestation period was 440 pounds per head.

Docility Is Neglected

When Ewes Are Roughed

The person who has roughed his ewes through from fall until lambing day will find that he has neglected one very important feature, and that is docility, for with the roughing of live stock generally goes negligence. It is a very easy matter to open the rear gates and with a short turn the sheep in and out of a pen. But if the owner or herdsman would take about half an hour's time and morning prior to turning out and letting in, to walk about and examine his flock carefully, sometimes with a pair of grain, holding out a mouthful to the ewes among the flock, he would soon gain the confidence of his whole flock and instead of his running away from him they are glad to hear his master's voice, and will follow him readily into the yard or out to the field without crowding and becoming panicky.

Hogs Relish Rape

Neither soy beans nor rutabagas are likely to do much in corn. About the best green feed is dwarf Essex rape. This belongs to the turnip family but it grows leaves instead of roots. Hogs are fond of it and seem to do well on it. It will grow and make feed in about six weeks if moisture conditions are favorable. It would be just as well to sow the seed just before the first cultivation, early in the season, working it in the land with the cultivator.

Live Stock Hints

Beef from young animals is lighter in color than that from older animals.

Beef from older animals will ripen more satisfactorily than beef from calves.

Never neglect times of feeding for regularly in feeding is most important, and its effects are far-reaching.

Approved methods in swine raising pay. These include sanitation, proper housing, good ventilation, good breeding stock, and balanced rations.

Brood sows should receive approximately one-half a pound of grain a day during the gestation period. About ten days or two weeks before farrowing time corn should be replaced by bran and oil meal.

Plenty of exercise and a variety of good feed will put the brood sow in good condition for her work in producing the spring litter.

The local butcher has always provided an important outlet for cattle. His nearness to the producer gives him certain advantages.

While many horses run outside during the winter season, a good shed should be provided to afford them protection from snow and wind in the coldest weather.

"First Aid—Home Remedy Week" Coming

Chicago.—First Aid-Home Remedy Week, Sterling Products' "better merchandising and greater advertising baby," celebrates its tenth anniversary March 15-21. Druggists everywhere will co-operate. "Fill That Medicine Chest Now!" is the slogan of action. The National Association of Retail Druggists sponsored the event in 1922, and with the National Wholesale Druggists' Association and National Association of Retail Drug Clerks have, with other organizations, massed their energies for success of this movement for the abolition of much needless suffering and often the salvage of life.

Dr. W. E. Wells was first to okay the idea as a splendid aid to preparedness for unexpected illness or accident. This is stressed as sensible insurance for immediate relief.

The every-spring festival of sales is a fixture of housecleaning time. Sterling Products is giving a tenth anniversary surprise party to every druggist in America—for the Dominion as well as the States endorses this idea of a more intensive advertising effort in Druggism. Replacing the old streamers there has been adopted a colorful poster representing a filled medicine chest displaying the slogan of each past success: "Fill That Medicine Chest Now."

Castoria corrects CHILDREN'S ailments

WHAT relief and satisfaction it is for mothers to know that there is always Castoria to depend on when babies get fretful and uncomfortable! Whether it's teething, colic or other little upset, Castoria always brings quick comfort; and, with relief from pain, restful sleep.

And when older, fast-growing children get out of sorts and out of condition, you have only to give a more liberal dose of this pure vegetable preparation to right the disturbed condition quickly.

Because Castoria is made expressly for children, it has just the needed mildness of action. Yet you can always depend on it to be

Europe Raising Much Wheat

Europe raises much more wheat than does the United States. In 1923, according to the preliminary report, excluding Russia, Europe raised 1,415,000,000 bushels, while the United States raised 807,000,000 bushels.

WOMEN SHOULD LEARN USES OF MAGNESIA

To women who suffer from nausea, or so-called "morning sickness," this is a blessing. Most nurses know it. It is advised by leading specialists:

Over a small quantity of finely cracked ice pour a teaspoonful of Phillips' Milk of Magnesia. Sip slowly until you are relieved. It ends sick stomach or inclination to vomit.

Its anti-acid properties make Phillips' Milk of Magnesia quick relief in heartburn, sour stomach, gas. Its mild laxative action assures regular bowel movement. Used as a mouthwash it helps prevent tooth decay during expectancy.

LEARN NURSING

(©, 1931, Western Newspaper Union.)

Lesson for March 22

THE USE AND ABUSE OF GOD'S GIFTS. (Temperance Lesson)

GOLDEN TEXT—And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the Spirit.
LESSON TEXT—Luke 12:13-48.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Tells Us How to Use God's Good Gifts.

TUNING TOPIC—Jesus Tells Us How to Use God's Good Gifts.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Sin of Drunkenness and Gluttony.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Enslaving Power of Strong Drink.

1. Warning Against Covetousness (vv. 13-15).

1. The occasion (v. 13). The occasion of this warning was the request of one of the company that Jesus be the umpire regarding a disputed estate.

2. Jesus' reply (v. 14). He said, "Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you?" He refused to enter the sphere of the civil law. Christ's mission was pre-eminently spiritual.

3. The warning (v. 15). The clear implication is that if due attention is given to incanting right principles in the hearts of the people, civic and economic problems will largely adjust themselves.

11. The Parable of a Rich Fool (vv. 16-21).

The parable of this rich planter shows clearly that to be concerned with earthly riches while neglecting God is the height of folly. Observe:

1. The increase of his goods (v. 16). This clearly implies that his riches were rightfully obtained, for the ground brought forth plentifully.

2. His perplexity (v. 17). His land was producing more than his barns would hold. He was at a loss to know what to do. No thrifty man wants to see the legitimate fruits of his toil perish. If he had possessed right views of life and a sense of stewardship before God, he would have seen that his barns had enough for his personal needs and then have distributed the surplus to the needy.

3. His fatal choice (v. 18, 19). He chose to enlarge his barns and give up his life to ease and luxury. He made plans without consulting God.

4. His awful indictment (v. 20, 21). God called him a fool. His plans were cut short by an immediate death sentence.

111. The Certain Cure for Anxiety (vv. 22-34).

Having shown the folly of rich men who gained gold and lost God, Jesus now urged the disciples to trust God and dismiss all anxious care.

1. The argument (vv. 22, 23). It is summed up in one brief sentence, "The life is more than meat and body is more than raiment."

2. The illustrations (vv. 24-28). (a) God's care for the fowls (v. 24-26). The ravens do not sow nor reap. They have no storehouse nor barn yet they live, for God feeds them. If God does not forget the fowls, certainly he will do more for his children. (b) God's care for the flowers of the field (v. 27, 28). If God is so careful of the flowers which appear but for a day, how much more will he clothe his children?

3. The exhortations (vv. 29-34). (a) The getting of food and clothes should be man's chief concern. (b) Seek the kingdom of God (v. 31). Those who make God's kingdom first, shall have all their needs supplied (Phil. 4:19). (c) He not afraid (v. 32). God's good pleasure is upon his own, and all good things he will give. (d) Practice self-denial in order to be able to give to those in need (vv. 33, 34).

IV. Be Ready for the Coming of the Lord (vv. 35-48).

Jesus warned the disciples against the acquisition of worldly goods while forgetting God, and shown them the needlessness of anxiety for food and clothing. He showed them the blessedness of being in a state of readiness when the Lord shall come. This attitude of heart he made clear by two parables:

1. That of the returning lord (vv. 35-37). The Lord will be so pleased with those who are waiting for him that he will take delight in sitting at the banquet with them and even serving them.

2. The thief in the night (vv. 38-40). This parable shows that the time of the Lord's coming is not known. The proper thing is to be ready.

3. Reward will be given to the faithful (vv. 41-48). The faithful servant will be promoted at the coming of the Lord. A faithful judgment will be meted out upon the unfaithful servant.

How you feel in the morning tells the real story

THAT'S the time you should feel like whistling and singing. Your muscles should itch to tackle the day's work. Your mind should quickly solve the problem that baffled you the afternoon before. Don't let your health slip away so that a night's rest fails in its natural recuperative powers. When you awaken with a "dragged out" physical or mental feeling, heed those bad symptoms. That's the time you need a dependable tonic to help restore your old time energy. Try a bottle of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, which is sold by druggists.

Fishing is often just an excuse. What the man wants is to sit on the bank and daydream.

Bad Stomach Cause of Bad Skin

You can't expect to have a good clear skin if your stomach is weak and disordered.

Undigested food sends poisons through the body, pimples appear, skin grows sallow and loses color. But these troubles will end quickly and skin clear up if you will start today taking Tanha.

Tanha is made from herbs, berries and roots. A tablespoonful before each meal stimulates the digestion naturally so that you can digest what you eat. And when your stomach is in good shape again watch how quickly skin begins to clear up. At your druggist's. Money back if it doesn't help you.

BUCHANAN

God above. She did of course find among these many of those whom she "had loved and lost a while." A smile wreathed her face in beauty and peace as her spirit greeted the loved ones that welcomed her to her father's home.

She was the first to go of her family and leaves the aged husband and her three children, one sister, seven grand children and two great grand children who are joined in their grief by a host of friends and relatives.

She is gone but not forgotten. Memory will clothe itself with the beauty and grandeur of her godly life. Others will follow the footprints she has made upon the sands of time until they find themselves in the eternal city of God.

Heart to heart and hand in hand Love shall clasp again her own, In God's sinless summer land.

COUNTY COUNCIL BEING ASKED FOR APPROPRIATIONS

Unusual items are to be considered in additional appropriations for 1931 asked of the DeKalb county council in a meeting called by County Auditor Frank E. Lyon for Tuesday, April 7.

Chief of these is one of $9,000 for the county's portion of the expense of road No. 27 south of Garrett. The county commissioners agreed to pay one-fourth of the cost of paving the highway. The state highway commission sent the county a bill for about $35,000 some time ago and one-fourth of the sum was paid from the county gravel road repair fund. Now the board is asking for the payment of another fourth from the general fund.

Another item is for $450 for a machine gun and two bullet proof vests for the sheriff's office. Sheriff John P. Hoff states that such a gun would cost $200 and the vests $125 each. He recommended to the commissioners that the equipment be purchased and they will ask the council for a sufficient appropriation.

A third item is for $25 to be spent for flags used in the ceremonies of the county on next Decoration day. The appropriation is sought by the American Legion.

The two other appropriations asked by the commissioners are $200 for recorder's office expense and $50 for compensation for the secretary of the county board of finance.

FARM TAXABLES ASSESSED LESS

A report of the first week of assessing in DeKalb county made to County Assessor Charles E. Miser Saturday by the township assessors indicates a loss of about 20 per cent in the valuation for taxation of farm personal property.

Last year the loss on such taxables was $400,000 and the reduction will probably amount to as much this year, in the opinion of Mr. Miser. However, the loss was more than made up in 1930 by the increase in other taxables in the county and Mr. Miser believes the net loss this year will not be great, if any.

The township assessors' reports for the first week were compiled by Mr. Miser and averages drawn, as follows: farm implements, $200; horses, $75; mules, $75; milk cows, $50; other cattle, $28; sheep, $6; sows, $28; other hogs, $8; poultry, dozen, $3; automobiles and trucks, $240; household goods, $210; diamonds and jewelry, $300.

The assessors will have these averages to guide them in the rest of their canvassing and Mr. Miser believes some of the averages will be improved.

MISS STELLA NELSON DIES AT FORT WAYNE

Miss Stella Nelson, aged 67, owner of the Nelson Flower Shoppe, 2006 Broadway, died Friday evening at 6 o'clock at her home, 201 East Branning Avenue, after a brief illness of apoplexy. Miss Nelson had spent the day Thursday in her place of business and was in good health until about 1 o'clock Friday morning.

For many years Miss Nelson was connected with Vesey Greenhouses until a little over four years ago when she started in business for herself. She had been a member of the Third Presbyterian Church and was prominent in its activities. She also was active in starting and aiding the Westfield Presbyterian Church in Fort Wayne.

Surviving are the mother, Mrs. L. C. Nelson, of Fort Wayne, two sisters, Mrs. H. C. Bell, of St. Petersburg, Fla., and Mrs. H. K. Chambers, of Oak Park, Ill., and a nephew and niece, Katherine Laura and Nelson Wheeler, of Oak Park.

Short services were held at the home Monday afternoon at 1:30 o'clock, conducted by Dr. James L. Chesnut, and the Rev. A. F. Bourne, of the Anthony Boulevard Presbyterian Church. Interment in the St. Joe Cemetery.

Miss Nelson will be remembered by many in St. Joe as her father was pastor of the Lutheran Church back in 1890.

129 CRIMINAL CASES FILED IN DEKALB IN 1930

The annual statistical report of County Clerk Glenn Potter to the state legislative bureau shows that 129 criminal cases were filed in DeKalb county during the year 1930.

Of these, there were 83 sentences to state penal institutions and 40 other defendants were fined only. No defendants were acquitted, but 16 cases were dismissed and 42 defendants drew suspensions of sentence. The number of cases pending at the end of the year were 16.

The number of marriage licenses issued were 255. The court granted 89 divorces, of which 27 were to wives and 12 to husbands. There was also one annulment of a marriage.

The number of civil cases pending at the beginning of 1930 was 260, and 383 were filed during the year, originating in this county. Venued from other counties were 53 cases. The total number of cases on the docket during the year was 643. Of these, 10 were dismissed, and judgment was entered in 219, making a total of 364 disposed of. The number pending at the close of the year was 279.

The clerk also reports that during 1930, 106 letters of administration and 25 guardianships were issued, 19 decrees of foreclosure were entered, 18 sheriff's sales were held and 7 persons were adjudged of unsound mind.

ST. JOE PERSONALS

Clay Coburn is on the sick list.

Eight sons of the Union Veterans of the Civil War held a service at the Kinsey Funeral Home Tuesday evening in honor of Mr. Florence Buchanan. The family accompanied the men here for the evening.

A free cooking school is being sponsored by the Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., at Butler, Thursday and Friday this week for the benefit of local ladies. It would be well for a good attendance from this community and show their appreciation for the efforts of the company in serving our homes and community electrically. No obligations on your part.

John Williams, of Kendallville is here a guest in the War Coburn home.

Clifford Millman will do some of the farming for Mrs. Lizzie Millman this summer.

M. C. Blue has purchased the Barney lot near the M. P. Parsonage and the barn on the former Haisley property.

Mrs. Frank Baker is here taking care of her mother, Mrs. Anna Dilley, who was taken sick last week. Mrs. Dilley is improving but is still confined to her bed.

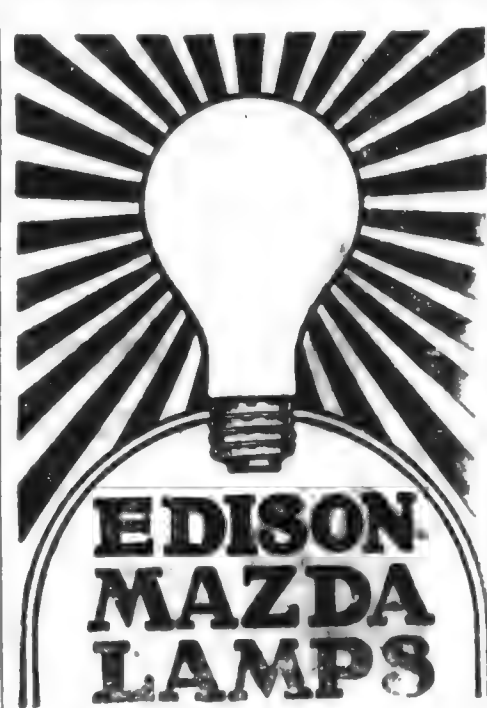

No change was made whatever in the open and closed fishing season by the Indiana Legislature just adjourned. The closed season on game fish remains the same as heretofore, from April 30th to June 16th. The daily catch and size limit on all game fish remains the same.

For February the statistics of the Game Warden service show: arrests, 52; convictions, 45; cases pending, 2; dismissed, 5; and costs and fines amounting to $1,072.25.

Wm. Quance will represent The News at the state basketball tournament at Indianapolis and enjoy the courtesies extended this paper through the press ticket sent us last week.

Mrs. H. D. Hollinger and son, Harold and daughter, Zenith called at the Laney Gee home Monday afternoon. Mrs. Hollinger also called to see her great uncle, Mr. Isaac Meese.

Mrs. Parlia Hull, Mrs. Wm. Long and Mrs. Simon Nicholls began working on the night shift at the Butler garment factory Monday. Several ladies from north of town are working on the day shift.

Now... Shell makes it possible for motorists to save MILLIONS

See, on this chart, what Shell has done... It may cut down your driving costs many dollars

AFTER long research, Shell is ready to supply it. A new, amazing gasoline—at regular prices—which more than 75% of all cars can use with perfect satisfaction!

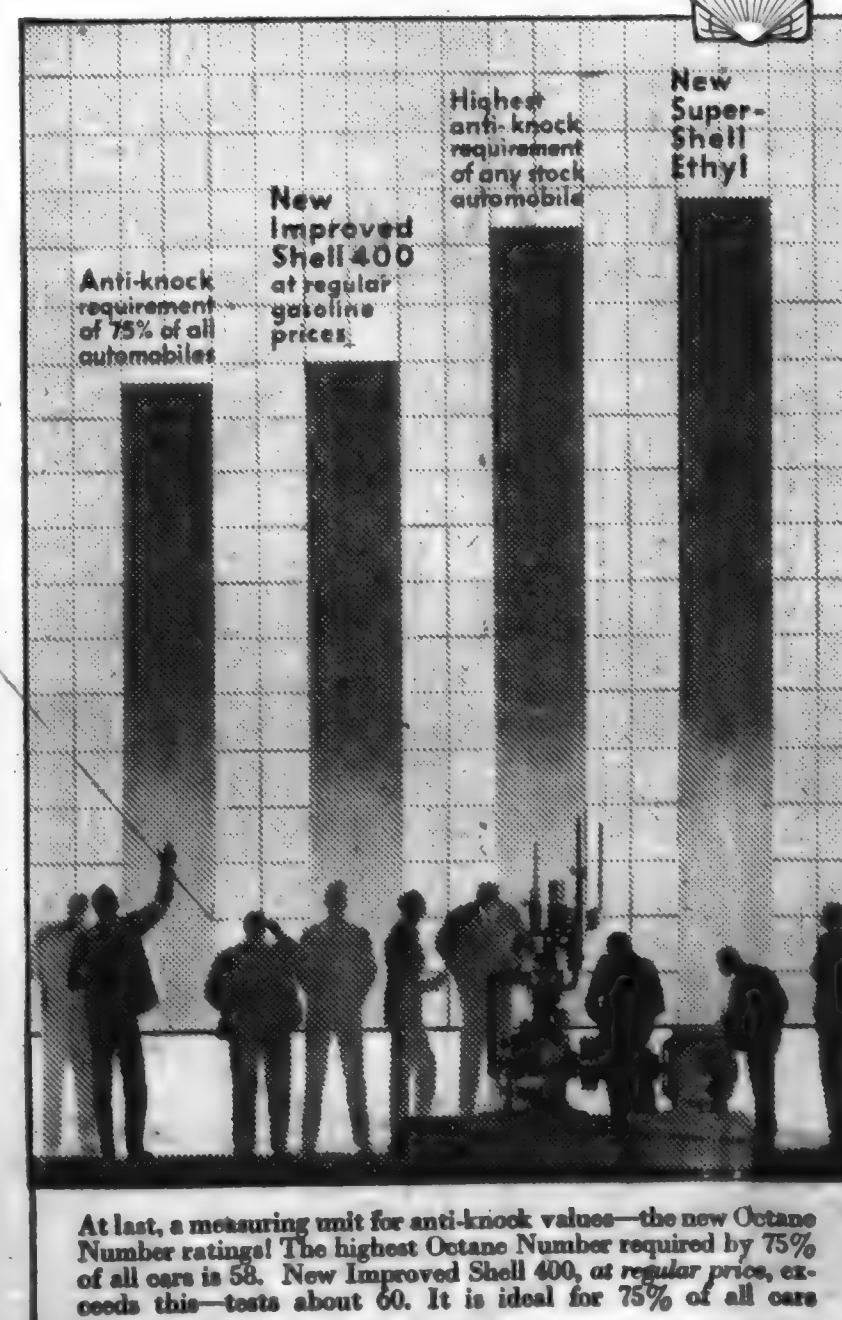

In anti-knock value, New Improved Shell 400 is far above common gasolines—in fact, above many premium priced brands. And anti-knock value is the real difference between good regular priced fuels and premium gasolines.

New Improved Shell 400 will give at least 3 cars in 4 full power, quick starting and get-away. Their owners can save the extra 3 cents per gallon. And save on repair bills, too!

For the less than 25% of all cars that need even greater anti-knock value, Shell has perfected Super-Shell Ethyl. It is volatile, lively—a high-test, "scrubbed" gasoline plus genuine Ethyl fluid.

To owners of cars that need it, there is new smoothness, and a real money saving, in Super-Shell Ethyl. More mileage. Lower motor upkeep.

Take advantage of these new fuels. Test New Improved Shell 400 in your own car. 75% will find they can save real money by using it. If your car needs Super-Shell Ethyl, your station man will tell you. Ask about the nation wide mileage test.

NEW IMPROVED SHELL 400

Definitely better than many premium fuels, yet sold at regular prices—at least 75% of all cars can use it satisfactorily

ACTS OF 1931 ASSEMBLY WILL BE EFFECTIVE MAY 1

Acts of the 1931 legislature which adjourned a few days ago, will become effective on or about May 1, J. Otto Lee, secretary of the state printing board, said.

Last of the law copies of the 181 bills and eight resolutions approved by Governor Harry G. Leslie for incorporation in the "Acts of 1931" were sent this week to the Fort Wayne Printing company, which has the contract for publication of the acts, Lee said.

The printing firm has 40 days in which to complete the printing contract and to ship the required number of copies to clerks of the 92 counties. When the secretary of state has received acknowledgments from all the county clerks, he will notify the governor, who will proclaim the acts in effect. Four years ago the proclamation came on April 28 and two years ago on May 21.

Some of the acts became effective immediately upon approval by the governor, because of emergency clauses, while others carried specific effective dates which permitted their taking effect in advance of the governor's proclamation.

The law requires that each county clerk shall be sent 20 copies of the act for each 1,000 votes cast for secretary of state at the last general election. This will require 23,800 copies.

Each of the 160 members of the legislature will receive five copies. With the additional distribution authorized by law, the total number will amount to 26,000.

Because litigation caused the Newton circuit court measure to be left out of the 1929 acts, it will be incorporated in the 1931 volume as "act 224 of 1929."

YOUTH PUTS B. & O. SIGNALS ON BLINK

Melvin Conine, a youth of nineteen who was taken before Judge Endicott Saturday, confessed to stealing a battery and lamps from a flasher signal and thus endangering the lives of people using the Baltimore & Ohio crossing located just west of the Ohio state line in Newville township.

Conine said he wanted to make a lighting outfit. He lives about half a mile from the railroad so one day last June he went to the crossing, broke a lock and took a battery, the lamps and 90 feet of insulated wire. The crossing is in a cut and Conine left it unprotected. It was not until the next morning that the theft was discovered.

The railroad police in their investigation went to the Conine home, but young Mervin and his father, Wayne Conine, both denied any knowledge of the affair. It was afterward learned that as soon as the officers left, the two Conines loaded up the stolen articles and took them down to the Maumee river, sinking them in the stream. However, the officers eventually obtained evidence that satisfied them of young Conine's guilt and Perry Rowe, of the railroad police signed an affidavit that was prepared by Richard W. Sharpless, prosecuting attorney.

The arrest was made Friday by Officer Rowe and Lieut. I. R. Jones of the railroad police and Sheriff John P. Hoff. When he was questioned by the court, young Conine said he didn't realize the seriousness of the theft and the danger to the public. The value of the stolen goods is $29 and it was decided that restitution for the loss should be made to the railroad company. The sheriff was directed to order the young defendant's father into court to see what arrangements could be made before sentence was passed.

WABASH FREIGHT CARS PILE UP

Tuesday forenoon a west bound Wabash freight train piled up four cars near the depot when traveling at a good speed.

It seems that a draw bar pulled out and derailed three cars, plowing up the track, breaking the side track rails off, demolishing a steel car on the siding and bursting the head out of the second one on siding.

The Montpelier wrecker came to open the traffic. Three young men were riding about three cars behind the wrecked cars and they were thrown full length of the car but were not injured. Four men were riding another car, just ahead of the wreck. The cars were not loaded.

PRE-EASTER SERVICE PLANNED FOR SPENCERVILLE

Plans are fully completed for a three evening Pre-Easter service at the Spencerville M. E. Church, as stated by the pastor, Rev. H. A. Studabaker. The sessions will be held each evening at 7:15 with special speakers and music for each evening.

Rev. Homer Studabaker

Friday, April 3—the Easter music will be rendered by a male quartet from Hicksville and the sermon by Rev. Pugh, colored pastor of the First Baptist Church of Fort Wayne. You will want to hear Rev. Pugh, as he is a great preacher. At this service the Lord's supper will be served in style symbolical of the last supper, with the table being spread across the front of the church.

Saturday, April 4—Rev. R. L. Gates, pastor of the Bluffton M. E. Church will deliver the sermon, and DuWayne Kinsey of St. Joe will render a number of saxophone solos.

Sunday, April 5—The M. E. ladies quartet will render special music and Rev. A. S. Elzey, pastor at Ossian will bring the closing message.

The public is invited to attend these services.

R. H. C.

The Rural Housewives Club met in regular session Wednesday afternoon March 18th with Mrs. Louise Washler. Saint Patrick decorations were in evidence in each room and the lunch was served at the dining room table and carried out the colors of the decorations. It was not only pleasing to the eye but to the palate.

The responses to roll call were Irish jokes and the contests were Irish, too. After a very pleasant afternoon club adjourned to meet with Mrs. Ines Hadsell April 1st. Easter responses to roll call.

OLD FASHIONED MEETING HELD AT BUTLER

The Butler I. O. O. F. Encampment, No. 160 had an old fashioned get together meeting on Monday evening, with Grand Patriarch Elmer Davis and Past Grand Patriarch Anderson from Indianapolis present, also the District Deputy G. P. from Lagrange and Steuben counties, who were the honor guests. The following places were represented, Auburn, Garrett, Hamilton, South Milford and St. Joe. Laney Gee and J. C. Hull Milford brought their orchestra along with them to help enthuse the brothers.

After talks from the gifted speakers a bounteous Easter supper was served by the Butler Camp Cooks, to which all did justice to such an occasion for this time of the year. The object of the meeting was to get a better understanding of the workings of Odd Fellowship and to demonstrate to the community that we are a body of men who believe in the Golden Rule also the spiritual as well as the material side of life. After adjournment you could see that all in attendance were glad to have been one among them.

Butler Lodge will entertain the county and district I. O. O. F. meeting on April 9th, in the evening.

OBITUARY

Florance Buchanan, second son of David and Elizabeth McGee Buchanan was born at Fowlersburg, Brooke County, West Virginia, December 24, 1841.

At the age of 17 years he came to Indiana with his parents, making the trip in a covered wagon. They located on a farm in Concord Township, near Spencerville, which farm is now owned by Orange Herrick. In 1859 he went to Auburn to learn the cabinet maker's trade where he worked until war was declared.

In September of 1861, when the call for 300,000 volunteers was issued he enlisted in Co. H, 30th Indiana Volunteers and was assigned to the army of the Cumberland under General Buell. He was wounded at the battle of Shiloh April 7th and given a thirty day furlough but the wounds proved to be so severe that he was out of the service for three months. He participated in the Battle of Chickamauga and at the battles of the Atlanta Campaign. He was captured prisoner in the battle of Atlanta and held in the prison at Andersonville for one month when he was exchanged in the special exchange of Generals Hood and Sherman. He received honorable discharge on October 15, 1864.

March 21, 1870 he was married to Mary D. Rush at Auburn, Indiana by the Rev. S. B. Ward. To this union were born three children: Florence J. Rhoads, Martha E. Sturges, and Harry L. Buchanan.

In the fall of 1871 he opened a cabinet shop and furniture store in Auburn but five years later sold and moved to the Carr farm in Concord township, west of St. Joe. Here he lived till the fall of 1880 when he bought the William Simanton farm west of St. Joe.

In the year 1905 he moved to St. Joe where he lived until two years ago when he came into Fort Wayne because of failing health. He lived with Mrs. W. F. Rhoads until his death.

He became a Christian when a young man and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church in Auburn. When he moved to the farm he transferred his membership to the Concord Church. Later he became a member of the St. Joe Methodist Protestant Church where he was an effective member until his decease.

He fell February 7, 1931 breaking his hip. Because of his advanced age he was unable to make a recovery. He was resting in one room while his wife was ill in another. She passed away Sunday March 5th and he was so low that he knew nothing of her going. Just one week from the time of her passing he was called to the same home. No doubt he was delighted to see the face of his long beloved wife in this happy land. It is a kind providence that has saved them from the sorrow of separation.

He was an industrious man of sterling integrity who possessed deep and abiding convictions—a kind father and a devoted husband.

"A faithful friend and loyal patriot. To his God, his country, His family, his friends, He was ever true. He cherished his loved ones As only a strong man can do." He leaves to mourn the loss three children, seven grandchildren, two great grandchildren and many other relatives and friends as he goes to join the mother.

"They are at peace In the land of the Great Beyond For Death, the Gateway but led To the palace of their King Where they will rest from their weary journey In His loving smile and care— And in His tender mercy Will abide—happy there."

The funeral was held from the St. Joe M. P. Church on last Wednesday afternoon at 2:30 with the Rev. O. T. Martin, of Fort Wayne and Rev. B. W. Mayfield in charge. Interment was made in Riverside Cemetery, E. R. Kinsey in charge.

DISLOCATES SHOULDER IN FALL DURING SNOW

Mr. and Mrs. J. C. F. Abel, Mr. and Mrs. Laney Gee called on Mr. and Mrs. I. S. Hadsell and Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Jackson of Hicksville and Mr. and Mrs. Forrest Fusselman of Newville Sunday afternoon.

Mr. Hadsell is suffering from a dislocated shoulder caused by a fall during the recent snow.

Mr. Hadsell is somewhat improved but is still a great sufferer from rheumatism.

LADIES LITERARY CLUB

The spirit of Ireland's patron saint, St. Patrick watched over the guest night party of the Ladies Literary Club, Wednesday night, March 18, at the residence of Merritt Sechler, making the affair a huge success.

Each member brought a guest, and in addition several former members of the club came back as guests of the entire organization. A dinner consisting of chicken, peas, potatoes, shamrock salad, dessert, cake, rolls and tea was served to 45 persons. Between courses the members were enthusiastically joined by their guests in singing the club song. Also jokes representing the proverbial Irish humor were read by the individuals.

After the tables had been removed a program was given by members of the club. Two solos, "How Ireland Got It's Name" and "Mother Machree" sung by Miss Helen Ditmars and Miss Reba Woods, respectively, pleased the guests. Further tribute was paid to the Irish by the ladies quartette consisting of Mrs. Wm. Staman, Mrs. Fred Leighty, Mrs. Carl De Vore and Miss Helen Ditmars. Their

Gay Prints for Spring and Summer

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

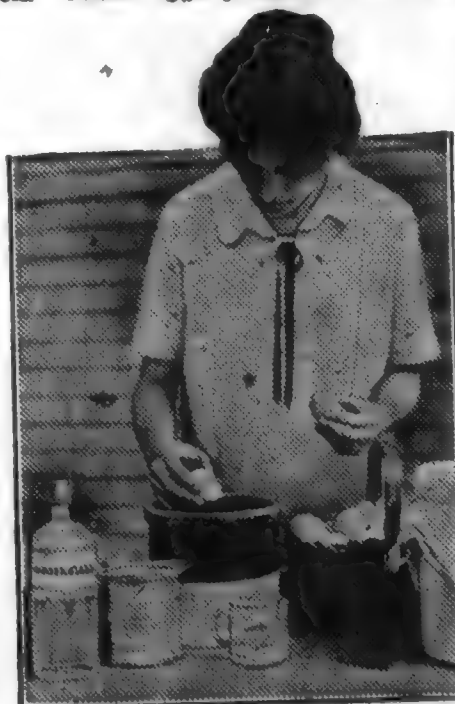

As every woman knows, there's nothing in the costume realm to equal a frock of any print when it comes to toning up the complexion, adding a new sparkle to the eye and imparting in general that much-coveted look of being young. In fact in the present, colorful patterned prints which have been fashion's idol year in and year out, the fair sex seems to have discovered the very fountain of youth.

And so the lure of prints abides with us, and this season the world of fashion seems to have grown more print-conscious than ever. In the new collections, no matter how temperamental one may be, there's a print for every mood. They run the whole gamut of emotions.

Preserve the Eggs for Winter Use

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.
If you have chickens it is quite probable that more eggs will be laid during the spring and early summer than the family can use. Some of these surplus eggs can be saved by putting them down in waterglass, so as to have more available for the winter months when the hens do not lay so well. Fresh eggs properly preserved may be kept in good condition for cooking purposes for eight to twelve months.

Putting Eggs Down in Waterglass Solution.

Eggs are an important addition to the diet at all times. For growing children they are so important that nutrition specialists recommend an egg every day or every other day for children over two years of age. For younger children the egg yolk only is recommended.
The white part of the egg is almost a pure watery solution of certain proteins of high value for body building and maintenance. The yolk of the egg is rich in proteins, fat, and compounds of phosphorus and iron in forms especially adapted for conversion into body tissue. The yolk also furnishes some calcium, needed for bone and tooth building, and certain of the vitamins, necessary for growth and development.

Probably no single article of food can be utilized by the housewife in a greater number of dishes than eggs. Eggs preserved in waterglass can be used with good results for all purposes in cooking and for the table. When such eggs are to be boiled, a small hole should be made with a pin in the shell at the large end, before putting them in the water. This is done to allow the air in the egg to escape when the egg is heated, and so prevent cracking.
Only very fresh eggs, preferably from one to three days old, should be preserved. If possible the eggs should be infertile. Under no circumstances should badly soiled eggs be used. Dirty eggs will spoil, and if they are washed the protective coating which prevents spoiling is removed. Cracked eggs should never be put down in waterglass. Even minute cracks may cause spoilage and contamination of the other eggs in the jar. It is a wise precaution to examine every egg by candling it before using.
Usually a few eggs are put down in waterglass at a time, whenever they are not needed for immediate consumption. A five-gallon crock, therefore, is a good size to use for the purpose. It should be set wherever it is to be kept before any eggs are put in, as it would be difficult to move it without endangering the eggs later on. A five-gallon jar will be large enough to hold 15 dozen eggs and still permit at least two inches of the waterglass solution to stand over the tops of the eggs.
The United States Department of Agriculture gives the following directions for the preparation of the crock and the preserving solution:
First clean the crock thoroughly. Scald it and allow it to dry. Heat a quantity of water to the boiling point and allow it to cool. When it is cool, measure out nine gallons of water, and add one quart of sodium silicate, or waterglass, which can be bought in most drug stores. Mix well. Eggs may now be put into the solution whenever there are any extra ones.

Meringue Adds Much to Dessert

In some ways a cream pie is easier to make than a custard pie. The shell is baked first, the filling is made in the double boiler, and then a meringue is spread over the top and nicely browned. For "company" purposes a dessert with a meringue seems a little more attractive than a just plain pie. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture furnishes the recipe.

1 pint milk or this 2 eggs
4 the. flour 1/2 cup sugar
1/4 cup salt 1/2 cup butter if
1/2 cup sugar 1/2 cup vanilla
Pastry
Heat the milk or cream in a double boiler. Mix the flour, sugar, and salt thoroughly. Pour some of the hot liquid into this mix well, and return to the double boiler. Stir until thickened, cover and cook for 15 minutes. Beat well. Pour some of this mixture into the beaten egg yolks, and add to the rest of the mixture with the butter and vanilla. Pour into a "baked" crust and let stand for a few minutes. In the meantime make a meringue from the beaten egg whites—four tablespoons sugar and a few grains of salt and a drop or two of vanilla. Spread over the pie filling to the edge of the crust and bake in a very moderate oven (325 degrees Fahrenheit) for 15 to 20 minutes, or until lightly browned.
To make a banana cream pie, add sliced bananas to the custard mixture after it is cooked, cover with the meringue and bake in the usual way.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.
"A housewife with a limited budget should be enabled, under the terms of the McNary-Mapes amendment to the food and drugs act, to buy a standard product within the reach of her pocketbook which will carry the nutritive if not the esthetic value of standard canned foods—provided she reads intelligently the labeling required by the amendment to appear on the product," said Dr. P. B. Dunbar, assistant chief of the federal food and drug administration, addressing a joint session of the National Canners' association and the National Wholesale Grocers' association, held at Chicago, in connection with the twenty-fourth annual convention. "And she should be able to buy that food without suspicion that she is purchasing something unfit for her family's consumption."
The McNary-Mapes amendment, Doctor Dunbar explained, authorizes the ## Food the Family Will Enjoy

By NELLIE MAXWELL

German Pot Roast.—Select a large roast weighing four or five pounds, rub with spices on all sides. Take one teaspoonful each of nutmeg, cinnamon, clove, mix well and use to cover the meat. Slice one large onion and lay half of it in a large bowl with two bay leaves and a clove of garlic. Lay over this the meat and cover with the remainder of the onion. Pour over one cupful of vinegar mixed with one cupful of brown sugar. Let stand 24 hours, turning several times. Cook meat like any pot roast, in a tight iron kettle, with iron cover, using all the liquid, adding water if necessary.

Chicken.—Take one pound each of veal and pork steak cut thin. Cut the steaks into one and one-half inch squares, sprinkle with salt, pepper, paprika and celery salt. Put the squares on small wooden skewers, using five or six pieces, alternating the veal and pork. Dip into egg which has been mixed with milk; roll in flour and fry in hot fat until well browned. Place in a baking pan. Cover and bake one hour, basting frequently with butter and water.

Noodles Wilmington.—Take six cupfuls of chicken stock, one-half cupful of diced chicken, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful of paprika, one cupful of broken noodles, one-half pound of fresh mushrooms, and the following vegetables diced: One-third of a cupful of celery, one-fourth of a cupful of green peppers, one tablespoonful of chopped onion, one tablespoonful of chopped pimientos, one-third of a teaspoonful of salt and one cupful of water. Cook gently for 20 minutes, add to the chicken a bit of flour to thicken and cook until well blended, using four tablespoons of flour and two tablespoons of water.

Rice a la 1931.—Mix one and one-half cupfuls of cooked rice with five tablespoons of sugar, fold in one and one-half cupfuls of whipped cream, using a teaspoonful of maraschino syrup. Chill, serve in tall sherbet glasses. Cover with whipped cream, sprinkle with chopped nuts and garnish with a maraschino cherry.

Evening Fairy Tale for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

IN THE SWAMP

"I have such a nice suit," said Mr. Fox Sparrow. "It is stylish, I think, to wear a reddish brown coat and a spotted waistcoat."
"And your dress is nice, too,"
"Ah, yes," agreed Mrs. Fox Sparrow, "I am so much pleased with my own dress."
"I like to moult and improve my feathers, but I like to have them come back the same way as they were, that is the same color and of the same kind."
"Perhaps it is because of our reddish brown feathers that we are called fox sparrows," said Mr. Fox Sparrow.
"Are foxes reddish brown, and have their feathers?" asked Mrs. Fox Sparrow.

Lower them carefully into the crock to avoid cracking them. Be very careful to keep at least two inches of the waterglass solution above the top layer of eggs. The crock should be well covered to prevent evaporation. Waxed paper tied around the top will be satisfactory, as it is easily removed for adding more eggs. If the solution evaporates perceptibly, more should be mixed in the same proportion and used to maintain the level.
Eggs preserved in this way may be taken out at any time. If waterglass cannot be obtained, eggs may be preserved in a solution of lime water made by dissolving two or three pounds of unslaked lime in five gallons of water. The liquid remaining after the lime has settled is used to fill the jar in the same way that the waterglass solution is used.

"Oh no, my love," smiled Mr. Fox Sparrow. "Foxes haven't feathers. They have fur. And their fur, I believe, is of different colors. Sometimes it is gray, and sometimes, it is red, it is red."
"So perhaps, you see, because there is red in our feathers, the same reddish shade which foxes have in their fur, that we are called fox sparrows."
"Well, we're settled for the summer," said Mrs. Fox Sparrow. "It is earth to see what they can find."

They sang the Most Glorious Song, nice and cool here, and in the winter we were south where it was nice and warm.

"What a fine swamp! We lived in, and what nice old leaves we used to dig up, so as to find out what was underneath."
"We were like people who used to dig for hidden treasures!"
"Yes," said Mr. Fox Sparrow, "and we were like chickens, hens and roosters, for they dig and scratch the earth to see what they can find. "It was such fun to look under the leaves and to stop to talk over what we had found."

"We did have a fine winter. What are your plans now?"

"I'm going to build a nest," said Mrs. Fox Sparrow, "of moss and soft grass for a lining, and I shall put in some nice feathers, too, so it will be comfortable when the five little greenish-blue eggs which I shall soon lay turn into birdlings."

"The eggs will have nice little reddish brown spots on them, which shows that they are to have reddish-brown feathers later on."

"Of course that doesn't follow with most birds, but I like to think of the dear little reddish-brown birds there will be when the reddish-brown spots on the greenish-blue eggs turn into precious little babies."

Then they sang the most glorious song, for the fox sparrows have beautiful, clear and musical voices. They were so happy thinking of the birdlings there would soon be and they talked of swamp life with such happiness.

In fact all around the birds knew that soon the little birdlings would arrive for the fox sparrows sang so beautifully and so joyously and so happily.
Soon they were joined by other Mr. and Mrs. Fox Sparrows and they sang and made their plans in the same way.

LITTLE BOB WHITE'S FRIEND

WITH his eyes tightly closed because of the terror in his heart the little Bob White with the aching broken wing, broken by the shot from the terrible gun of the hunter, was being carried he knew not where by Farmer Brown's Boy. Very tender was the way in which he was carried and after a while he began to take a little comfort in the warmth of the hand which held him. Once in a while Farmer Brown's Boy would gently smooth the feathers of the little head and say, "Poor little chap."

"I Guess That Really I Am a Lot Better Off."

keep them from slipping. It hurt dreadfully and the little Bob White didn't know what it all meant. But he had suffered so much already that a little more suffering didn't matter much and he bravely wished back the tears and didn't so much as peep. When it was all over he was just put into a box with a bed of soft, clean hay, a little dish of water where he could reach it by just stretching out his head, and a handful of wheat, and then he was left alone. He was too sick and weary to want to do anything but squat down in that bed of hay and rest. He was still afraid of what might happen to him, but it was not such a great fear as before, for there had been something comforting in the gentle touch of Farmer

Brown's Boy. He didn't understand at all what those strange wrappings about his body meant, but a lot of the ache and pain had gone from the broken wing and perhaps they had something to do with this.

So gratefully he drank of the water, for he had been burning with thirst, and then settled himself as comfortably as possible and in no time at all was asleep. Yes, sir, he was asleep! You see he was so worn out with fright and pain that he couldn't keep his eyes open. Ever so many times during the day Farmer Brown's Boy went to see how he was getting along and was so very gentle and whistled to him so softly that his little heart no longer went pit-a-pat with fear.

The next morning the little Bob White felt so much better that he was up bright and early and had made a good breakfast of the wheat by the time Farmer Brown's Boy came down stairs. But it seemed very queer not to be able to move his wings. He couldn't lift them even the tiniest bit because, you see, Farmer Brown's Boy had bound them to his sides, with strips of cloth so that he couldn't even try to fly. This was so that the broken wing might get well and strong again.

Now of course the little Bob White had lived out of doors all his life, and Farmer Brown's Boy knew that he never could be quite happy kept in the house. So he made a wire pen in the hen-yard and in one end he made the nicest little shelter of pine-boughs under which the little Bob White could hide. He put a little dish of clean water in the pen and scattered wheat on the ground and then he put the little Bob White in there.

As soon as he was left quite alone the little Bob White ran all about to see what his new home was like. You see there was nothing the matter with his legs.

"I can't get out," said he when he had been all around the pen, "but neither can any one get in; and so I am safe, and that is something to be thankful for. This two-legged creature is not at all like the one with the terrible firestick, and I am beginning to like him. I haven't got to fear Reddy Fox or Old Man Coyote or Redtail the Hawk. I guess that really I am a lot better off than if I were out on the Green Meadows unable to fly. Perhaps when my wing gets well I will be able to go. I wonder where my father and mother and brothers and sisters are and if any of them were hurt by that terrible firestick."

Warner Baxter

Before he rose to prominence in the talking pictures, handsome Warner Baxter had much stage experience, principally with stock companies. His first picture was with Ethel Clayton in "Her Own Money." Later he had important roles in other popular productions. Baxter is a native of the Buckeye state—Ohio—having been born in Columbus, where he was educated.

INTERNATIONAL RADIO

TWO important events occurred on the anniversary of Lincoln's birthday this year. In order of time the first was the message of Pius XI, who spoke from the Vatican city. Those who listened to his voice had the unique experience of being among the first to hear the voice of the pope outside of the Vatican. It was with a feeling of deep appreciation and gratitude for the marvelous results of scientific research that one listened to a voice speaking from far-away Rome. Aside from the message itself, the mere fact that one can be brought so near a city of the old world through the human voice, is certainly indicative of great possibilities in the field of international radio.

International radio may come to be the media through which we shall have a better understanding between nations. When a group of persons disagree they will most likely come to a mutual agreement if they will dispassionately gather around a table and talk it all over. Such a procedure usually results in the establishment of the spirit of good will because of a correct understanding. Exactly the same thing is possible between nations.

Distance seems to break down and we feel very near the world beyond the seas when we can listen to the music of Europe, hear the chiming of Big Ben in London, and listen to the human voice speaking to us from many important centers.

The second event was the message of our own President whose voice was heard in thousands of homes on the night of Lincoln's anniversary. It is not the purpose of this article to comment on either address, but the mere fact that such achievements have been accomplished makes one pause and ask, "What next?" It was certainly a rare privilege to hear, sitting by our own fireside, the voice of our own President. At one of the public receptions in the White House, a humble stranger shook hands with one of our Presidents remarking, "And are you the President?" The reply was, "Yes—I am your President." A just pride of "American citizenship" must creep into the heart of every lover of his country when he realizes that whoever is President he is our President and that he speaks to us.

THREE HELPS TO CHEAP HOG GAINS

Cleanliness, Well Mixed Rations and Shelter Needed.

Cleanliness, well mixed rations and proper shelter are three allies upon which a farmer may rely in making economical gains with his pigs, according to J. S. Coffey, professor of animal husbandry for the Ohio State university.

For profitable pork production it is essential to keep the hog shelter and feed lot free of worms, he says. A comfortable, dry shelter, large enough to prevent piling, is also an important help in turning pigs into market hogs.

Because the winter ration is likely to be short in minerals a feed should be used which contains a mineral mixture, such as 40 per cent finely ground limestone, 40 per cent bone meal, and 20 per cent common salt. The ration of this mixture, in Coffey's opinion, is of about 1 per cent of the ration.

Hogs are in danger of suffering from anemia in the winter and therefore should be brought in direct contact with sunshine as often as possible, Coffey declares.

Save All Straw Stacks to Carry Farm Stock

The main element in food for cattle and horses is the bulky feeds such as hay, fodder, and, in their absence, straw will take the place of these bulky feeds for live stock and are of second importance when it comes to sustaining life and carrying the stock over to a new season.

In many communities there are haystacks which have been carried along. Some may have reached a ripe old age, but nevertheless they will sustain life and will come in handy.

In many communities there are also strawstacks which, heretofore, have been considered of no value. Ideas as to the value of stock feeds will change of necessity, and straw will sustain life, whether it be of this season's crop or produced in prior years.

Therefore, straw should be carefully conserved in these communities especially which are threatened with a feed shortage, or in any community reasonably close to the dry districts, so that it may be had as a bulky feed for the stock this winter.

Large Number of Lambs Marketed Never Docked

A considerable number of the lambs produced in Iowa and the surrounding states are grown and marketed without having their tails docked. According to counts made at some of the mid-west live stock markets, as high as 20 per cent of the native lambs sold during the summer and fall months have full length tails.

Failure to dock is a source of loss in two ways. The long tails covered with wool collect dirt and filth and invite flies of various types to lay their eggs here. As a result, maggots hatch and cause unthriftiness and sickness and even death. The second source of loss is lower selling price received. This lower price is partly due to less desirable appearance, and partly due to lack of uniformity in size and condition, due to handicaps coming from failure to dock.

Put Cattle on Pasture and Full Grain Ration

Cattle that have been wintered on hay and silage, or other rations not containing much grain, and that can be put on pasture and a full grain ration at approximately the same time, should make the transition from hay to grass rather easily and with no break in gains. Baby heaves, cattle approximately a year old at grass time, have the greatest difficulty in making satisfactory gains during the first month or two on pasture. The older the cattle, the better they can make the change and utilize grass in making fat beef. "Short yearlings," when brought the fall before, make a more profitable use of pasture while on feed than younger stuff.

Worms Cause Loss

Thorn-headed worms are causing big losses to hog growers, especially in bluegrass areas. This worm passes a stage of its life in the white grub which is often found in bluegrass pastures. Hogs take the eggs of these worms into their digestive tracts through their feed and drink. Figs which are infested become thin and listless and fail to thrive. There is no effective cure. The best remedy is to keep the hogs off from land where hogs are worm infested.

For COLDS

We all catch colds and they can make us miserable; but yours needn't last long if you will do this: Take two or three tablets of Bayer Aspirin just as soon as possible after a cold starts. Stay in the house if you can—keep warm. Repeat with another tablet or two of Bayer Aspirin every three or four hours, if those symptoms of cold persist. Take a good laxative when you retire, and keep bowels open. If throat is sore, dissolve three tablets in a quarter-glassful of water and gargle. This soothes inflammation and reduces infection. There is nothing like Bayer Aspirin for a cold, or sore throat. And it relieves aches and pains almost instantly. The genuine tablets, marked Bayer, are absolutely harmless to the heart.

Can't PLAY Can't REST

—child needs Castoria

WHEN a child is fretful and irritable, seems distressed and uncomfortable, can't play, can't sleep, it is a pretty sure sign that something is wrong. Right here is where Castoria fits into a child's scheme—the very purpose for which it was formulated years ago! A few drops and the condition which caused the trouble is righted; comfort quickly brings restful sleep.

Nothing can take the place of Castoria for children; it's perfectly harmless, yet always effective. For the protection of your wee one—for your own peace of mind—keep this old reliable preparation always on hand. But don't keep it just for emergencies; let it be an everyday aid. Its gentle action will ease and soothe the infant who cannot sleep. In more liberal doses it will effectively help to regulate sluggish bowels in an older child. All druggists have Castoria; it's genuine if you see Chas. H. Fletcher's signature and this name-plate.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"TO SHOW ONE'S HAND"

TO SHOW one's hand is to reveal one's purpose, to disclose one's intentions.

It is a common phrase but not so common a performance, and when it happens it usually causes comment.

The expression is a happy one, and, like many another which is part and parcel of our everyday lives, it has been adapted from a specialized field for a wider use.

In this particular instance, we have the phrase from the game of poker in which, at certain stages, as our readers are undoubtedly aware, the player shows his hand, that is to say, he exposes his cards.

From this game, therefore, the English language borrowed the eloquent card playing metaphor under discussion and applied it to the broad field of human activities.

THE WHY OF SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

TO PREVENT LOCKJAW

IF YOU scratch yourself with a rusty nail stick the nail immediately into hard wood and you will not have lockjaw. At least that is what they say in New England and variants of this belief are found on other sections of the country. Among the Grand Banks fishermen there is a belief that if, when a fishhook pierces the hand, the fishhook is stuck three times into wood the wound will not fester nor will any other evil consequences result from it.

Here we have once more a survival of the old, old worship of the tree-god coupled with the primitive belief in sympathetic magic. The nail, or the fishhook, by its penetration of the flesh having attained a certain sympathy with the wound it caused is handed over to the tree-god to be dealt with and the tree-god, accepting the appeal of the wounded man and his votive offering, purifies the offending instrument or neutralizes its pernicious qualities and it in turn, by sympathetic magic, renders the wound harmless.

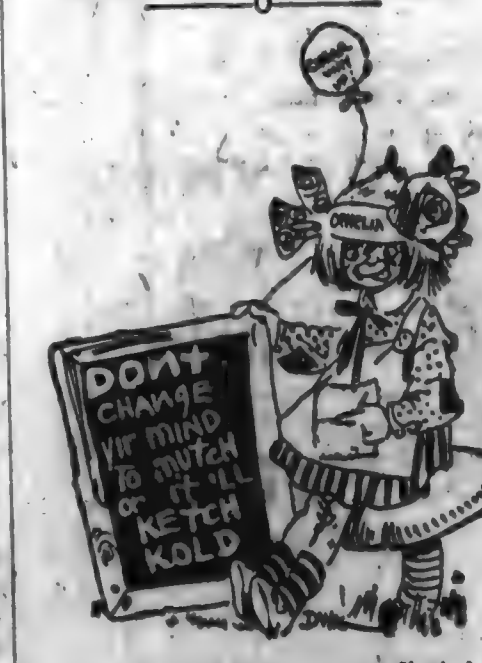

It is the same sort of magic which, when you have rubbed a piece of pork on a wart and buried the pork causes the wart to disappear when the pork decays; only here the direct intervention of the tree-god is invoked—which is needed as nails and fishhooks do not readily decay.

The Old Gardener Says:

THE common or bearded iris should be given the most sunny spot in the garden. It likes warmth and insists upon good drainage. It will not thrive if planted in a low damp spot, and if the ground is heavy and inclined to be wet in spring the beds where the irises are to go should be raised a few inches above the surrounding soil to make drainage certain. A little bonemeal can be used to enrich the soil, but manure should be avoided. The use of lime when planting irises is often advisable.

The people have been engaged in leveling and beautifying the cemetery at this place, which will add much to its beauty and appearance and can be mowed with a lawn mower.

CONCORD

The revival services closed Sunday evening, conducted by Rev. B. W. Mayfield.

Mrs. Ernest Farver, son and lady friend, of Auburn were Sunday guests of the Chas. Morr family.

LOWER CEMENT PRICES MEANS MORE ROADS

Due to the reduction in the price of cement from $1.65 last year to $1.36 this year, the state highway commission will be able to build approximately 20 miles more of concrete paving. The commission will use 1,750,000 of barrels of standard cement and 20,000 barrels of high, early strength cement for patching and in closing gaps at bridges.

Model of "Radio City" for New York

The New York public got its first conception of the $250,000,000 "Radio City" when plans for the project, which is to occupy three blocks facing Fifth avenue, between Forty-eighth and Fifty-first streets, were shown in the offices of the engineers for the enterprise. The 50-story skyscraper group, which will be established through the interest of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., is expected to be completed by 1934.

PAGE CHICAGO COACH

Pat Page, former football coach at Indiana university, has been appointed baseball coach at the University of Chicago, and is busy getting his men together for spring practice. Page was a star southpaw pitcher at Chicago for three seasons in 1908, 1909 and 1910. The Maroons won the conference championship in 1909.

Lesson for March 29

REVIEW: JESUS THE WORLD'S SAVIOR

GOLDEN TEXT—How God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power; who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil; for God was with him.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Busy Doing Good.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Busy Doing Good.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Jesus the World's Savior: Preparation and Popularity.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Jesus the World's Savior: Preparation and Popularity.

Since the lessons of the quarter center in one person and have one theme; namely, the world's Savior, the best method of review for senior and adult classes will be to refresh the mind with the principal facts and leading teachings of each lesson. Assignments should be made a week ahead. The following suggestions are offered:

Lesson for January 4.

John the Baptist was a great preacher. He had a great heritage in his godly parents. Much can be expected from a son of such parents.

Lesson for January 11.

Jesus, as to personality, was divine and yet his human nature developed in the normal way. He waxed strong in body, was filled with wisdom, and God's grace was upon him. Though conscious of his deity, he lived a life of filial obedience.

Lesson for January 18.

John the Baptist came in fulfillment of prophecy, calling upon men to prepare for the coming of the Messiah by repenting of their sins. Baptism was the appointed sign of their repentance. With this humility, John turned the attention of the people from himself to Christ.

Lesson for January 25.

Jesus was led into the wilderness by the Holy Spirit to be tempted of the Devil. His temptation was Messianic. The purpose was to demonstrate the reality of the incarnation. Jesus was from the place of anointing and heavenly recognition as the Son of God to meet and to spoil the enemy of God and man (Heb. 2:14).

Lesson for February 1.

Jesus demonstrated his power over various diseases and over demons, thus displaying his Lordship. Even while demonstrating his mighty power, he operated through benevolent channels.

Lesson for February 8.

Jesus made clear to the disciples that they would be hated and opposed as they went out into the world with his message. Those who follow Christ must expect opposition and suffering.

Lesson for February 15.

Jesus is the friend of sinners. There is no one so steeped in sin as to be shut out from him. Christ came into the world "to seek and to save that which was lost."

Lesson for February 22.

Jesus' supreme mission was to make known the good news of salvation to a lost world. In spite of the good seed sown by him, only a small portion brought forth full fruitage owing to the unfavorable condition of the soil.

Lesson for March 1.

The greatness of the harvest—man's lost condition moved Jesus to ask the disciples to pray the Lord to thrust out laborers. The real force back of missionary endeavor is prayer. When the church begins to pray about missions, there will be missionaries and money to sustain them.

Lesson for March 8.

The parable of the Good Samaritan shows who is my neighbor and what being a neighbor means. My neighbor is the man needing my help, whether next door or across the world. Being a neighbor is the most important thing for me. To be a neighbor means to be on the lookout for those in need and to give sympathetically the needed help.

Lesson for March 15.

The Bethany home was always open to the Lord. Jesus will come into such homes as will give him welcome. The inspiration of the Bethany home must have greatly helped Jesus as he went out to meet his foes. It is the inspiration of the home which gives men courage to go out and fight the battles of life.

Lesson for March 22.
The parable of the rich fool shows the peril of allowing the heart to be set upon even the fruits of legitimate toil. To seek gold and thus forget God is to play the fool.

The next quarter continues the lessons from the gospel by Luke.

Our Love to God

Our love to God brings us a gleam in earth's darkness to show us whither we are going. It keeps us in sympathy with God's work everywhere. It is our enlistment in the army of good will toward men.—Isaac Edwards.

Men of Genius

Men of genius are often dull and inert in society, as a blazing meteor when it descends to earth, is only a stone.—Longfellow.

To be a Healthy Woman watch your Bowels!

What should women do to keep their bowels moving freely? A doctor should know the answer. That is why pure Syrup Pepsin is so good for women. It just suits their delicate organism. It is the prescription of an old family doctor who has treated thousands of women patients, and who made a special study of bowel troubles.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is made from fresh, laxative herbs, pure pepsin and other harmless ingredients. It doesn't sicken or weaken you. No restrictions of habit or diet are necessary while taking it. But its action is thorough. It carries off the sour bile and poisonous waste. It does everything you want it to do. It is fine for children, too. They love its taste. Let them have it every time their tongues are coated or their skin is sulky.

When you've a sick headache, can't eat, are bilious or sluggish; and at the times when you are most apt to be constipated, take a little of this famous prescription (all druggists keep it ready in big bottles), and you'll know why Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is the favorite laxative of over a million women!

CHAPTER VII—Continued

"August can't make you nearly as comfortable as I can," Sir George answered confidently and proceeded to do it. Never, Robert MacBeth admitted, had he been made so comfortable.

"My word, you have gentle hands for a big fellow," he exclaimed, looking up with gratitude at the tall form that bent over him to straighten a pillow. "Plenty of practice."

Robert MacBeth checked himself when he started to say "Where?" He remembered that this tall, slim young man before him had been through a dreadful novitiate during the great war.

"Why," he asked after a moment, as Sir George moved to ring for the waiter, "why do you so determinedly avoid rich girls? Seriously isn't that what you came here for—to make a rich marriage?"

Sir George drew himself erect and turned quickly and savagely. Then, as though the sight of the other man's helplessness checked his natural resentment, stiffened. "That what you think, too?"

"Isn't it true? Or at least partly true?" Robert MacBeth questioned, taking advantage of his inferiority. "Wouldn't it help you put Sandisbrae in order and yourself on your feet?"

The young man's face darkened. "Oh, undoubtedly! But I'm not going to put Sandisbrae in order at that price, nor am I sure that it would not take me off my feet."

He paused. "If you will believe me, sir, I would like very much to have it finally understood that I came out here for a job and nothing else. I'd like to put myself on my own feet." He looked up again. "No matter what dear old Aggy says, that's the truth and," he hesitated, "and I'd be obliged if you would bring yourself to believe it, and to tell Miss Roberta that you do believe it."

"Why, particularly Roberta?" MacBeth asked dryly. "Because," the young man's face paled, "possibly if she was assured of this by you, she might change her attitude."

"Which is?" "Which is one that I have not been accustomed to," Sir George said simply, "and one which is not pleasant for a self-respecting man. If it will help matters out," he continued, still with the same quiet simplicity, "you can assure Miss Roberta that if she had the wealth of India belted around her waist, I wouldn't look the road she walked on, much less want to marry her." His tone was heated.

Roberta's father surveyed him with gathering rage. "Set your mind at rest," he declared grimly. "There's no danger of her ever looking your road. I have that from her own lips."

"Good! Then if you will take the trouble to tell her I never dreamed of lifting my eyes to her, or to your pocketbook, you may make it easier for her to treat me as a harmless young man, her father's diligent secretary and no spy."

"What do you mean by that?" demanded Robert MacBeth, and receiving no answer, at once, said even more anxiously, "What do you mean by 'spy'?"

"That I am not one. Yet Miss MacBeth treats me as though I were continually spying upon her."

"What reason has Roberta to fear that?" her determined father asked again.

"I plead ignorance," declared his secretary, inwardly cursing himself for having even hinted at it. "I don't know the reason for her suspicion. I only know that it is so, and she makes me feel it."

were not with the cigarettes, but on a stand near the window, and moved to get them.

Robert MacBeth opened his lips to tell him that Ray Brown and others had been in France during the war and were really as old if not older than Sir George, when he remembered that the boys who went over from here, though they fought and suffered as bravely as any there, had at least come home to a land of settled peace and plenty, which had not been Sir George's case. He was about to put something of this in words, when to his amazement the cigarettes were dashed on the desk and Sir George, with a quick low exclamation went plunging through the window and along the terrace, in rapid pursuit of some one or something.

CHAPTER VIII

Some one had been listening at the window. Though he flung himself so headlong into the pursuit that he was still carrying in his hand a box of matches and the single cigarette which he had taken out of the box for MacBeth, Sir George was not in time to see his quarry round the corner. He flung the matches and cigarette from him, and leaped over the edge of the terrace and went toward the little landing place, where he could see a man getting into one of the canoes.

He had every reason to believe that in a moment he would have him in his grasp when Roberta MacBeth rose suddenly, it seemed to him out of the earth, though it was really only from behind the shrubbery near the landing place, and blocked his way. He flung out his hand, to keep from falling himself or knocking her down, and grasped her shoulders. He spun her out of the way, disregarding her gasp of "What's wrong?"

But the delay had been sufficient. There was no sign of the man he had been pursuing, and when he reached the water's edge there was no one there. Mechanically he began searching for some hiding place among the boats, when Roberta joined him. She was alone and breathless, and both facts made Sir George suspicious.

"What happened?" she asked him abruptly.

He answered her with equal abruptness. "You have just prevented my capturing some one who was watching, or listening, under your father's window."

She gave him a quick startled look, and then raising her voice a little higher, whether with intent or astonishment he could not be quite sure. "What things you imagine. How could he have come this way without my seeing him?"

Sir George did not answer. He went down to the water's edge and then started toward the bridge which lay in shadow. Instantly this provoking girl was in front of him again.

"I asked you—"

In the heat of his anger at her persistence he answered her as he would not have done if he had stopped to think for a moment. "Some friend of yours, evidently, since you are so anxious to screen him."

She stepped back as though he had struck her.

"Do you mean—" she began. "I don't mean anything," he answered, avoiding her. "I would like to continue my search alone. Go back to your guests, or go back to your father, and explain to him why you blocked my way."

He had twisted from her now. If she had wished to stop him she could not. He ran, with the quick swiftness which his long legs made possible, across the little bridge and up the road that led to the highway. The road behind and before him was quite empty. He waited a moment, his senses alert, for any movement in the brush but there was none. Not a sound, so far as he could hear. He went slowly back to meet, as he crossed the bridge, various riotous greetings and questions as to where and when he had lost his girl. He replied to them in the same jesting tone, relieved that he had not been seen running along the terrace, and that no one had been alarmed.

Robert MacBeth gave him a quick inquiring look. He answered it with a little warning frown.

Lady Sandison went toward the door with some of Robert's guests, saying in a low voice to her stepson, as she passed him: "Dance with Roberta, laddie. She's missed you."

"I can't flatter myself so much as to believe that Aggy. I advise you—as they say over here—to 'lay off us.' You can't drive us together."

"Dear me, dear!" said Lady Sandison and hurried after her guests. MacBeth looked up at Sir George as the others left the room.

"Well?" "Who?" "The man who was listening at the window."

"You're crazy!" "I chased him along the terrace and down to the water's edge and then—" "Well?" "Then I lost him."

"Why?" "Because a girl got between us. I had to avoid knocking her down. The fellow got away."

"Who was the girl?" "Rather not tell, sir."

"Then you think she knew something?" "I could not say."

Robert MacBeth gazed at him puzzled. "What would he want under my window?"

"Again I don't know, sir. But there are a lot of you men here tonight. They—I mean the gang after your payroll—may have thought you would discuss some of your plans. Some one was there—and he was listening."

Robert MacBeth leaned back to study the facts again. While he did so the band played a riotous fox trot. "If you're worried about the payroll," MacBeth, who had been smoking and thinking, suddenly said aloud, "the spy went empty away. Nothing said to anyone tonight about our plans."

"Good! Then we'll sleep on it. I have a scheme which I would like to tell you about tomorrow."

A voice from the door made them look up. "Tired, Dad?" Roberta asked. She glanced quickly at the two men. "Has Sir George been scaring you with his imaginary men-behind-window-curtains? He's so determined to find us infested with wild men shooting pistols that he sees bandits everywhere. Better send him to Mexico, Father, and let his dreams come true."

"Who told you about it?" MacBeth took from one to the other. "Oh, Sir George, of course," Roberta laughed. "I met him when he was hot on his wild goose chase."

MacBeth stared. "Did you? He didn't tell me that. What were you doing when you stopped him?"

"Nothing," said Roberta, and bit her lip. What a fool she was! Sir George would be certain to fasten all his silly suspicions upon Jack! How easy it would have been to have said she was looking at the water or waiting for her dance partner.

Changes Have Made Men Subservient to Women

All fights for freedom, that succeed, go so far, and become in turn the instigation of a tyranny. Like Napoleon or a Soviet. And like the freedom of women.

Perhaps the greatest revolution of modern times is the emancipation of women, and perhaps the deepest fight for 2,000 years and more has been the fight for women's independence, or freedom, call it what you will. The fight was deeply bitter; and, it seems to me, it is won. D. H. Lawrence writes, in Scribner's Magazine.

It is even going beyond, and becoming a tyranny of women, of the individual woman in the house, and of the feminine ideas and ideals in the world. Say what we will, the world is swayed by feminine emotion today, and the triumph of the predictive and domestic activities of man over all his previous military or adventurous or flaunting activities is a triumph of the woman in the home.

The male is subservient to the female need, and outwardly, man is submissive to the demands of woman.

Wide If Not Widest

New Orleans claims one of the world's widest streets, for its Florida walk covers 438 feet between property lines.

To split cobblestones for masonry work requires an experienced stone cutter. A pitching tool and hammer are used.

Rich Stamp Collection

Envy by Philatelists

The most frankish and one of the most valuable stamp collections in France is pasted on the walls of the cottage of a priest in the Savoy Alps. Collectors who have found the stamps have bid fabulous prices for the right to steam the collections from the walls, but since church property belongs to the French government, the stamps must remain pasted up until they are spoiled by time.

The collection was started half a century ago by a young priest who had no other distraction in the mountain village. The community is an hour's walk and climb from the nearest road. But the priest received a great quantity of mail, and friends sent him stamps to add to his collection.

He started pasting stamps on the bare walls in place of wall paper. And then, as the collection grew, he pasted more on top, making fresh designs out of the issues of various countries. There are nearly 250,000 old postage stamps on the four walls of the salon, many of them now rare issues much sought after by collectors.

The French collection is particularly rich, with copies even of the famous balloon stamps issued for air mail by gashab, when Paris was being besieged by the Germans in the war of 1870.

There is a triangular stamp from the Cape of Good Hope, some Vatican stamps of the first issue before Italy took over the pontifical territory, war stamps from 1870 from Alsace and Lorraine, the first issues of Norway, the famous Greek Mercury series and countless others.

Submarine Life Viewed

by American Scientists

Exploration of one the most thrilling and mysterious territories in the world has been accomplished by the expedition of the New York Zoological society's department for tropical research.

The expedition has been exploring the world under the sea. At their Bermuda station on Nonsuch island the sea is limpidly clear, and it greatly facilitates observation of submarine life.

Not content with shallow water work, the bold explorers and their engineers took a leaf out of Jules Verne's book, and invented a kind of diving bell called the bathysphere.

This consists of a steel shell in globular form, built with a glass window for observation purposes, which could be lowered to a great depth in the ocean.

Communication with the shore or boat is maintained by telephone, and air supply is also provided for, so that the occupants of the bathysphere were able to enjoy comparative comfort.

In this great shell observers were lowered into the ocean, and they actually reached the depth of 1,400 feet. From the window many wonderful forms of fish and marine animals were seen.

Luminous fish were common, and well-known fish were seen to advantage in their native environment. From the window of their bathysphere the scientists had visions of a new world, and perhaps the continuance of their investigations will provide us with tales of new and undreamed-of wonders.

Fascists Organized to Combat Socialist Ideas

What is known as Fascism in Italy originated in Milan in March, 1919, when Benito Mussolini and about 170 of his friends organized a movement of nationalism and syndicalism, taking for the symbol the fasces, a bundle of rods containing an ax, carried by the lictors before the magistrates of ancient Rome as a symbol of authority. The movement was anti-Socialist and its aim was the defeat of the Reds, or radical element, which after the World war appeared to be gaining a preponderance of power with consequent disorder.

The Fascist organization was mostly of young men who were dissatisfied with the findings of the peace conference, in which it was held that Italy was discriminated against. The party grew rapidly until among the "black shirts," as they were named, there were upward of 200,000, practically all young men. They formed a political party under a protectorate, but on obtaining power expressed adherence to the monarchy. September 10, 1922, Mussolini became both the head of the party and of the government.

Civil War Memory

The sale of the Jack Paul grocery store at Mexico, Mo., reminded J. W. Coakley, eighty-five-year-old Confederate veteran, that he had transacted business with four generations of the Paul family, three in Missouri and one in Virginia. He recalled that in 1862 after the Yankees had captured the salt mines near his home, and the price of salt had soared, he rode horseback for six miles to the Paul store at Harrisonburg, paying $1 for four pounds of coarse barrel salt—Indianapolis News.

CRUELTY TO BABY CHICKS

(By Prof. Paul G. Bailey)
The baby chick season is here. More chicks are going out every day. A great many folks will wonder this year why they lose so many chicks, why those they have don't grow so well and look weak. They wonder why it takes so much longer than it should to get the cockerels to a weight of two to two and a half pounds, when they can be most profitably put on the market as broilers.

Providing that the ration has a good formula and is made of good ingredients, the big reason for slow growth, lack of uniformity and considerable loss, is the fact that few people use enough hopper space.

If there are five people in your family and the table is only large enough to accommodate two, somebody has to wait a good while or go hungry. The same thing applies to baby chicks.

Not one brooder house in fifty has enough hopper space to give the chicks the right kind of a start and to give them a chance to grow satisfactorily. Less than this will cause slow growth and increased mortality.

Check up on hopper space. Be sure you have enough and then watch the chicks grow. But, above all, don't be guilty of cruelty to animals, because that is what lack of hopper space really is so far as baby chicks are concerned.

SHELL MOTOR OILS and GASOLINE

ST. JOE, INDIANA

Now... Shell makes it possible for motorists to save MILLIONS

See, on this chart, what Shell has done... It may cut down your driving costs many dollars

AFTER long research, Shell is ready to supply it. A new, amazing gasoline—at regular prices—which more than 75% of all cars can use with perfect satisfaction!

In anti-knock value, New Improved Shell 400 is far above common gasolines—in fact, above many premium priced brands. And anti-knock value is the real difference between good regular priced fuels and premium gasolines.

New Improved Shell 400 will give at least 3 cars in 4 full power, quick starting and get-away. Their owners can save the extra 3 cents per gallon. And save on repair bills, too!

For the less than 25% of all cars that need even greater anti-knock value, Shell has perfected Super-Shell Ethyl. It is volatile, lively—a high-test, "scrubbed" gasoline plus genuine Ethyl fluid.

To owners of cars that need it, there is now smoothness, and a real money saving, in Super-Shell Ethyl. More mileage. Lower motor upkeep.

Take advantage of these new fuels. Test New Improved Shell 400 in your own car. 75% will find they can save real money by using it. If your car needs Super-Shell Ethyl, your station man will tell you. Ask about the nation wide mileage test.

NEW IMPROVED SHELL 400

Definitely better than many premium fuels, yet sold at regular prices—at least 75% of all cars can use it satisfactorily

SUPER-SHELL Ethyl

For the less than 25% of cars which require an extremely high anti-knock value to operate most efficiently. Priced 3 cents more per gallon

THREE ARRESTED ON BOOTLEG CHARGES

(Monday Star)
An unusual situation arose Monday morning when Sheriff John P. Hoff and his deputy, Herbert N. Grimm, went to the home of John Shutt near Spencerville to arrest him and his wife, Goldie Shutt, on bootlegging charges.

Meets Sheriff Hoff
While the officers were there Wilbur Roth, Fort Wayne drove in to deliver some liquor to Shutt. He had a gallon and a half in his car and the officers took him into custody also.

Roth was taken before Judge Endicott at noon and pleaded guilty. He is only nineteen years old, but has been married two years. He said he formerly worked at the Dudlo plant at Fort Wayne, but was furloughed. He had to buy prepared milk for the baby and had no money, so went into the liquor business. He admitted it was the wrong thing to do, but said he didn't know how else to make a living.

The court took the youth's case under advisement until Tuesday. His wife was in court with him. Roth formerly lived at Grabbill and his parents reside there. Roth claimed he obtained his liquor in Allen county. The affidavit against him was signed by Deputy Sheriff Grimm.

The charge against Shutt and his wife is the sale of liquor. Ellsworth Morr signed the affidavit against while Lloyd Schrader signed the other affidavit. Morr and Schrader are only seventeen years old.

Find Moonshine
The officers were not satisfied that Shutt was telling the truth when he declared that there was no liquor in the house and they went Monday afternoon to the place to search further.

In an upstairs room underneath a window sill the base board was a blind trap and when Sheriff Hoff stepped on it the board cracked.

Ingenuously hidden under the window sill between the walls the sheriff discovered some strings and when he pulled at one of them a bottle came to light.

There were four pint bottles of moonshine hidden between the walls.

When confronted with the moonshine Shutt confessed to selling liquor.

Given Heavy Penalties
Heavy penalties were imposed Tuesday afternoon by Judge Endicott upon John Shutt and his wife, Goldie, of near Spencerville, and Wilbur Roth of Fort Wayne.

Shutt and his wife pleaded guilty to the illegal sale of liquor. He was fined $250 and costs and was sentenced to the penal farm for four months, while his wife was fined $100 and costs and was given a sentence of sixty days to the correctional department of the woman's prison at Indianapolis.

Roth, charged with possession of liquor, was fined $100 and costs and was sentenced to the state farm for forty days.

Sells To Young Boys
Shutt and his wife admitted they had been engaged for some time in bootlegging and they had some boys of tender years among their customers. When the officers went to their place Monday Roth drove up with a gallon and a half of liquor to deliver to Shutt.

Shutt informed the arresting officers that he bought liquor for $1 a quart and sold it for $1 a pint.

Offers Excuse For Business
He said he was a World War veteran and had been shell shocked while at the front. He receives a dollar a day pension and he said he expects $800 in a short time on his application for a bonus. He intended to stop selling liquor, he said, after he received the money.—Tuesday Star.

LITTLE FOLKS HELP CELEBRATE BIRTHDAY

Eighteen little friends of Ruth Kessler gathered at her home Monday evening, March 30, 1931 and reminded her of her eighth birthday. A very pleasant time was enjoyed by all.

Those present were: Helen Goodwin, Treas. Epier, Helen Fay Curie, Jean and Lella Hurni, Betty and Nelda Kees, Christina Zonker, Deloris Mayfield, Joan Ridgway, Eloise Coburn, Ruth and Myra Kessler, Jacqueline and Chalmers Shuff, Richard Ridlan, Frank Curie, Marcel Pugsley.

Time was spent in playing games. She received many beautiful presents. Dainty refreshments were served by the hostess assisted by Jean Ridgway and Eloise Coburn. They departed for their homes wishing Ruth many happy birthdays.

ST. JOE GIRL DIES SUDDENLY

Ruth, the 18 year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Bishop, residing on the D. D. Burley farm, just west of St. Joe, died Monday noon, after only a few hours illness, due to brain fever development.

She became ill Sunday evening and by morning was unconscious and passed away at noon. During the night she became delirious.

Sunday afternoon Dr. Shook was called to see her, as she did not feel well enough to attend Sunday School, but only a slight fever from cold was noticeable.

It is thought her condition developed as the result of flu effect. Ruth graduated from the St. Joe high school in 1930 with honors, and has been at home since.

She was a member of the Rehoboth M. P. Church, although attended St. Joe most of the time after moving to this community.

Funeral services were held from the M. P. Church, Wednesday afternoon, with her pastor, Rev. Cormican, of Rehoboth and Rev. Mayfield, local pastor, officiating. Burial was made at St. Joe.

HARVEY KIMES PROPERTY WAS SOLD

The Harvey Kimes 20 acres, laying just at the outskirts of St. Joe, in Spencer township, was sold last Saturday to Martin Walter, of south of Spencerville, for a consideration of $2,425.

Rhodenbaugh & McNamara had the sale and there were three bidders for the home.

HOOVER WILL SPEAK TO 15,000 AT INDIANAPOLIS

President Herbert Hoover is expected to appear before an audience of 15,000 persons when he comes to Indianapolis June 15 to speak at the Indiana Republican Editorial association meeting.

Paul R. Bauman, president, said Friday.

The president will be the only speaker at the affair, to be held in one of the large agricultural buildings at the state fair grounds it was announced.

It was said the president would arrive in the city at 4 P. M., on June 15, with a parade and military escort directing him to the home of Governor Harry G. Leslie.

At 6 P. M. the president will be escorted from the governor's mansion to the fair grounds, where four acres of tables will be arranged for a banquet, at which the address will be delivered.

Bauman said Hoover will be introduced with the words: "Ladies and gentlemen, the president of the United States."

Those attending will include many from outside Indianapolis. Delegations from Lake county and Evansville already have made reservations, it was announced, and the secretary of state of Missouri has informed Indiana leaders that he, with representatives of the Missouri Republican Editorial Association will attend.

AARON CARPER OF JACKSON TOWNSHIP PASSES

Aaron Carper, one of the older and well known residents of Jackson township, died Friday morning at 7 o'clock at his residence 4 miles east of Auburn on the Auburn-St. Joe road.

Mr. Carper's age at the time of his death was 84 years, 8 months and 26 days, he having been born July 1, 1846, on the same farm where he died and has always resided.

On October 10, 1869, Mr. Carper was married to Jane Hughes, a resident of Jackson township and to them were born ten children, one of whom, Frank Capen, for a number of years the manager of the Northern Indiana Fuel & Light company of Auburn, is deceased.

Surviving besides the widow are the following children: Theodore of Garrett, Ollie and Wesley of Jackson township, Mrs. Birdie Fetters of Concord, Mrs. Inez Maurer of Spencerville, Mrs. Nettie Raub, now residing in the parental home, Mrs. Lillie Wallace of Fort Wayne, Mrs. Anne Andrews of Jackson, Mich., and Chas. O. Carper of Detroit.

The funeral services were held Sunday afternoon. Leaving the late home at 1:30, the body was taken to the Clark funeral home where at 2 o'clock Rev. Joseph Ferguson officiated at the service and burial followed in Roselawn cemetery.

SPENCERVILLE MAN FOUND DEAD IN BED BY WIFE

Harvey Beam, aged 59 years, 10 months and 22 days, suddenly died at his home in Spencerville being found dead by his wife on Friday morning of last week, as the result of a heart attack. Indications were that death came without a struggle. He was in his usual good health when he retired.

Mr. Beam was born May 5, 1871 and passed away on March 27, 1931. He was the son of David and Elizabeth Beam, being born 2½ miles east of Spencerville, and made Spencerville his home all these years.

He united with the M. E. Church in his young manhood and was an active member until his death.

March 17, 1910 he was united in marriage to Miss Louise Rummel. Besides the wife, he leaves three sisters, Miss Marilla Beam, Mrs. Amanda Timbrook, residing near Hicksville, and Mrs. Effie Squires, of Fort Wayne, and brother, Venette Beam, of Tekonsha, Michigan, and many other relatives and friends.

The deceased was a wagon maker and did tin work, roofing and general repair work here for years and maintained a repair shop that was greatly needed in the community.

Funeral services were held from the M. E. Church, Monday afternoon with Rev. Homer Studabaker officiating. Roscoe Walter had charge and burial was made in White City Cemetery.

EASTER FLOWERS

I wish to announce to the public that I have made arrangements with Fred B. Leighty to handle our line of cut flowers and potted plants, and anyone wishing flowers for Easter or any future occasion, can leave their order with our local representative, and he will take care of your wants. Floral offerings for any and all occasions can be taken care of and our work will be guaranteed satisfactory. Vegetable plants in season.

NEW RATES PROPOSED BY INDIANA & MICHIGAN

The Indiana & Michigan Electric Company will file with the Public Service Commission of Indiana, and the Michigan Public Utilities Commission, an additional rate for residential service.

The new rate will permit those customers who are now using ranges, refrigerators and certain other electrical appliances, on a rate classified as D. U. R. to combine the current used by these appliances, with the current used for lighting.

Under the old rate the customer received two bills, while under the new rate, the customer will receive one bill covering all current consumed by appliances and lighting.

Customers receiving service under the new rate will effect a substantial reduction in the amount of their monthly bills.

The Indiana & Michigan Electric Company will also file a modification of tariff C. L. Commercial Lighting, which modification will make a reduction in the first 2000 kilowatt hours consumed per month.

These rates will become effective on bills rendered on and after May 1, 1931.

In making these reductions, the Company is following their policy of periodic adjustment in rates for various classes of service.

During the past 36 months, the Company has made a revision of their schedules which has afforded a considerable saving to all classes of customers.

Customers affected by the new rates, will effect a saving of approximately $150,000.00 per annum.

Lesson for April 5

JESUS TEACHES HUMILITY

GOLDEN TEXT—For whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

LESSON TEXT—Luke 14:1-14, 18:15-17.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus and the Children.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Teaches Consideration for Others.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Living Others the Preference.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Spiritual Democracy.

I. Jesus Dining With a Pharisee (v. 1).

Jesus moved in all circles of human society, thus showing his divine sympathy. The Christian's influence is best when mingling with his fellows in all right relations and positions in life.

II. Jesus Healing a Man With the Dropsy (vv. 2-4).

1. Why this man was present (v. 2). While there is no way of absolutely determining, it was most likely a part of the plot of the Pharisees to trap Jesus by getting him to violate the Sabbath rules.

2. Jesus' question (v. 3). His question was an answer to the thoughts of the lawyers and Pharisees who were watching him. Before healing this man, he submitted his case to their judgment. They were free on the Sabbath to hold a feast where their selfish pride and vanity could be displayed, but they were horrified that a fellow man should be healed on that day.

3. Jesus healing the man (v. 4). While they were in a state of embarrassment, Jesus healed the man.

4. Jesus rebuked them (vv. 5, 6). He laid bare their hypocrisy by showing them that their willingness to show mercy to a beast on the Sabbath should induce them to regard as not sinful the relieving of a human being of distress on the Sabbath.

III. Jesus Rebukes Selfish Ambition (vv. 7-11).

1. The occasion (v. 7). He observed that the guests while taking their places at the table chose the best seats for themselves. This is still true of men and women in railway cars, hotels, street cars, etc.

2. Instruction given (vv. 8-11). When bidden to a feast take the lowest place lest you suffer the humiliation of being asked to take a lower seat.

This is more than a lesson on courtesy or table manners. It was a severe reuke of that selfishness which fills the human heart, causing it to seek to be ministered unto instead of ministering to others. The declaration of Jesus, "Whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted," sets forth the fundamental principle of the philosophy governing the moral world. The one who has experienced the redeeming love of Christ will gladly take the place assigned him.

IV. The True Motive in Deeds of Charity (vv. 12-14).

The Jews, like many of the rich today, made social dinners occasions for display. They invited only those whose wealth would enable them to recompense them by inviting them in return. Jesus took note of the selfishness thus displayed and set forth to them the right principle governing hospitable deeds. Such benevolent acts should be extended to the poor and afflicted. All charitable deeds should be done with unselfish motives. They should proceed from the one aim; namely, to confer benefits without expectation of a recompense. Jesus assured them, however, that recompense would be made at the resurrection of the just.

V. The Child Example (Luke 18:15-17).

1. Spiritual contact with Christ sought for children (v. 15). Presumably this was done by the parents. The time of all times to effect contact with Christ is in childhood.

2. Rebuked by Jesus (v. 15). Seeing Christ's time so completely taken up with adults, the disciples thought that bringing the children would be an intrusion.

3. Welcomed by Jesus (v. 16). Mark says, "Jesus was displeased with the conduct of the disciples"; that is, was indignant. Christ called the children unto himself, thus showing their relative value.

4. What he said about children (vv. 16, 17). "Of such is the kingdom of God." Childhood is the character which proves citizenship in the kingdom. Two traits are pre-eminent in childhood: (a) Absence of self-consciousness; (b) Natural trust. The way to realize this character is through surrender to Jesus Christ.

Teachings of the Bible

The foundations of our society and our government rest so much on the teachings of the Bible that it would be difficult to support them if faith in these teachings should cease to be practically universal in our country.—Calvin Coolidge.

Encouragement
Nothing earthly will make me give up my work nor despair; I encourage myself in the Lord my God and go forward.—Livingstone.

THIS Powder Base

ADDS SPRING

freshness

Roughness, sallowness and dryness—the tell-tale marks of winter can be easily smoothed, whitened and refreshed with Plough's Peroxide (Vanishing) Cream.

And this exquisite, fine cream makes your face powder cling for hours. Invisible—yet it harmonizes with skin texture to add an alluring new depth of beauty to complexions.

Plough's Cleansing Cream penetrates the pores, bringing forth all deeply embedded dirt and grime. It prevents "skin congestion" (dirt clogged pores) and keeps the complexion clear, clean and pure in tone.

Plough's Cold Cream brings back the precious moisture stolen by the dry home heat and blustery winter winds. It helps the skin to regain new life, new vigor and freshness, thus banishing wrinkles and hollows.

Each of Plough's Peroxide, Cleansing and Cold Creams is economically priced at 25c, 35c and 50c.

First Student—Anything interesting in your letter from home?
Second Student—Not a cent!

I DIDN'T SCRUB OR BOIL—YET LOOK AT THIS SNOWY WASH!

Linens so white—can't believe her own eyes!

WHAT a thrill, first time I used Rinsol! I wouldn't believe such a thing possible, if I didn't see it with my own eyes. A sweet, snowy wash—without scrubbing or boiling! I never dreamed washday could be so easy. Rinsol is a magical soap.

Saves the clothes

Scrubbing ruins things so—wears them threadbare—takes the brightness out of colors. But with Rinsol there's no scrubbing! Dirt soaks out. Clothes last much longer.

Rinsol is all you need, even in hardest water—no bar soaps, chips, softeners. Cup for cup, it gives twice as much suds as lightweight, puffed-up soaps. Suds that last!

Great in washers, too—the makers of 40 leading washers recommend it. And nothing like it for dish-washing! Get the BIG package.

MILLIONS USE RINSOL in tub, washer and dishpan

Know Your Husband
Mrs. A.—Read any fiction lately?
Mrs. B.—No, my husband hasn't written to me since he went to Cuba.

THE LAXATIVE WITH HIGHEST ENDORSEMENT

When you get up headachy, sluggish, weak, half-sick, here's how to feel yourself again in a jiffy. Take a little Phillips' Milk of Magnesia in a glass of water—or lemonade. Taken in lemonade, Phillips' Milk of Magnesia acts like citrate of magnesia. As a mild, safe, pleasant laxative, Phillips' Milk of Magnesia has the highest medical endorsement.

As an anti-acid to correct sour stomach, gas, indigestion, biliousness, it has been standard with doctors for 50 years. Quick relief in digestive and eliminative troubles of men, women, children—and babies.

Children's Hats Can Be Made at Home

Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture—WNU Service.

Here are two attractive hats for children which can be made at home very easily from a small amount of material. An old coat or dress might be used for the beret, and parts of an old raincoat or any garment made of water-resistant cloth, for the rainy day hat. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture, which designed these hats, will be glad to furnish measurements and sketches for making both of them.

The rain hat is not only becoming to small boys and girls, but it is constructed so as to shed rain, and is made of water-repellent cloth. The brim can be rolled back or left down in front, while the long back covers the back of the neck and protects it from rain. Many children of three to six years of age wear rain-proof play suits made of the same sort of material, and with this hat may play out of doors in any weather. The crown is made with six sections. The brim is double and is slightly stiffened with several rows of stitches about a quarter of an inch apart. The lining is cut from the same pattern as the crown and is slip-stitched in. The hat requires half a yard of material and a quarter of a yard of lining. It the band is shrunk by pressing under a wet cloth.

When a head covering can be made so easily and inexpensively at home, a child may possess several of different colors, to suit the occasion or the costume being worn. Children enjoy a change from "the same old thing" in their wearing apparel, and a bright new beret is a simple means of gratifying this entirely normal feeling. For wear while riding in an automobile, especially on long trips, a beret has no equal, as it stays on the head well and keeps the child's hair back out of his or her eyes. When the rest of a child's outfit is neutral in color, a beret of bright color such as red or orange or green, is really a safety precaution, making the child crossing the street noticeable from passing automobiles and other vehicles.

is designed for a 20-inch head also but may be made smaller by taking in the seams.

A beret is always a satisfactory head covering for a child of three or more, in fact, for a school child of almost any age. A boy's beret is made slightly smaller than a girl's, but otherwise from the same design. Cotton suède was used for making the beret illustrated, but any soft woolen fabric which will allow fullness to be smoothly gathered in will do. For spring wear, the beret should be light weight. If new material is used, half a yard of woolen fabric and a quarter of a yard of lining are sufficient. Berets, however, are very successfully made from parts of adult's clothing that is no longer useful.

The beret consists of four crown sections, a bias band, and a lining. The curved outer edge of each of the four crown sections is gathered until it measures five inches (one-fourth of the head size required, which in this case is 20 inches), and then stitched to the bias fold that fits around the head. All fullness along

Easy to Learn Machine Embroidery

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Have you learned to embroider the sewing machine way? No? Well, it's easy—easy to learn, easy to do—and the work goes so quickly you can finish a dozen napkins, monogram a tablecloth, smock a frock, or embroider fancy designs or monograms on guest towels in no time at all. The new art is called trim stitch, and requires no other equipment than a suitable trim stitch cotton, a very coarse machine needle, the machine itself, and electric or foot power.

The thread used is firmly twisted and heavy in comparison with the thread in general use. You can get it in bright colors, such as you would expect to find in embroidery silks and cottons. You will require a machine needle capable of carrying a 20 to 30 six-cord thread. Secure boldest colors, so that they will go through the laundry without injury. For outlining, monogramming, initialing, or stitching, use the trim stitch thread on top and in the bobbin. For the most effective work, the stitches should run from eight to ten to the inch. Two contrasting colors, such as blue or green on top and yellow or orange in the bobbin are effective.

Smocking is beautiful for dress yokes, for sleeves, for holding skirt fullness, for smocks, and for fine dresses of sheer fabric. For this work, adjust the stitch to seven or eight to the inch, and have an ordinary tension. Use size 24 white, six-cord thread in the bobbin. As these bobbin threads are the ones you will have to pull when it comes to the shirring, they will need to be strong. Group your trim stitch colors as you would for hand smocking, and stitch the rows true, so that when shirred up they will be perfectly even. When all the rows are in, stitch across one end to hold them securely. Then, from the opposite end shir the stitching up, pulling the bobbin threads only, drawing them up at the same time.

For tablecloths and napkins, this machine embroidery way is an easy method of initialing or monogramming. In initialing bath towels use large initials and stitch twice around each line. For table linen, use white trim stitch, with from two to six rows of stitching close together. Whenever a tailored stitching line is desirable, as on the edges of the collars shown in the sketch, several even rows of one color or of contrasting colors are effective.

Use of Electricity on the Farm

It is generally recognized, both among rural communities and by electrical leaders, that no economic question today has more significance for all concerned and for the nation at large than the proposition of making electricity available economically for the American farmer. The arrival of the time when this will be accomplished is likely to be hastened by providing electrical training for young men with farming knowledge and sympathies.

Mr. Mole were off for the next meadow. All their children went with them. Mrs. Meadow Mouse and Mrs. Mole had said at first it would be a great trouble to move but when they had heard of the Fairy Queen's warning they hurried away at once too.

And then they settled down where they were safe for a good long while. How kind the Fairy Queen had been to warn them.

They were certainly grateful to her! (© 1931, Western Newspaper Union.)

Evening Fairy Tale for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

"I have heard," said Mr. Meadow Mouse, to his friend Mr. Mole, "that the farmer around these parts has said that he was being very much bothered by the members of the head-ow mouse family and the mole family."

"The very idea," said Mr. Mole. "He should be flattered that we like his things."

"Yes, and pleased too! Don't you agree with me, Mr. Mouse?"

"I can't quite say that I do agree with you," said Mr. Meadow Mouse.

"I don't suppose he can be pleased to have creatures eat up the things he digs and plants in the ground."

"I suppose that's so," said Mr. Mole.

"Well, what shall we do, then?" asked Mr. Meadow Mouse.

"I'm sure I don't know," said Mr. Mole.

"Just then I thought I heard a sound," said Mr. Meadow Mouse suddenly.

And the sound came clearer and clearer and this was what a voice was saying:

"I advise you not to stay. You had better move away. For some day when the farmer passes, He'll chop your heads off with the grasses."

"Oh, what could that have been?" asked Mr. Meadow Mouse. And the voice went on:

"I'm not being seen. But I'm the Fairy Queen. I've brought you a warning. This nice, bright morning."

"Well, if that is so," said Mr. Mole, "we had better do as she said, and move away."

"I would hate to have my head chopped off."

"So would I," said Mr. Mole. "I wouldn't like it at all. I'll get my family and you get yours, and we'll go to the next meadow."

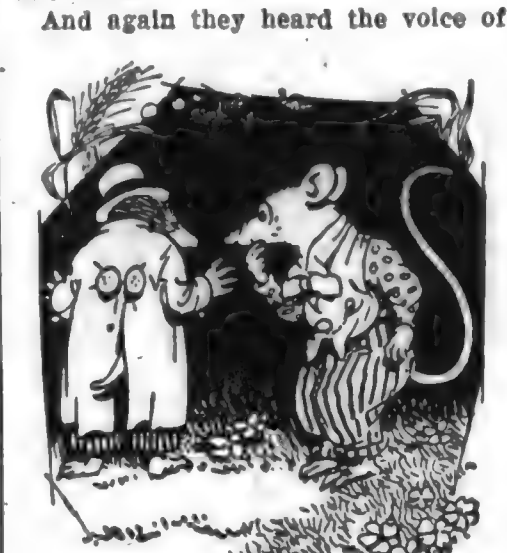

"There are goodies for you to try in the meadow just nearby. Better hurry up and go. Before the farmer starts to mow."

Pretty soon Mr. Meadow Mouse and

"How do you know?" asked Mr. Meadow Mouse.

Food For the Family Table

By NELLIE MAXWELL

"Among the most thoroughly self-deluded people in the world are those who think that in the multiplication of things and possessions, happiness and contentment lies."

In these days with hundreds of varieties of soups that come to us canned and ready to reheat and serve, one is hard to suit who cannot find one to serve for any occasion. For those who prefer to prepare their own soups, as most cooks do, except in emergency, the following good ones will warm and satisfy:

Tomato Bisque.—Cook three cups of tomatoes with one bay leaf, four cloves, one-half an onion, two teaspoonsful of sugar ten minutes, then strain, add one-fourth teaspoonful of soda and two cups of white sauce. Serve at once with croutons. To prepare the white sauce take one and one-half tablespoonsful of vegetable oil, one tablespoonful of minced onion, one tablespoonful of carrots, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one cupful of milk and pepper to taste. Cook (stirring over a low heat) the oil and the onion, add the carrots and stir and cook for three minutes, then add the milk and cook for five minutes. Strain and add to the hot soup.

Baked Bean Soup.—Take three cups of beans, three pints of water, two stalks of celery, bring to the boiling point, then simmer for 30 minutes. Rub through a sieve, add one and one-half cups of stewed and strained tomatoes, one tablespoonful of chili sauce and salt and pepper to season. Cook one tablespoonful of minced onion in two tablespoonsful of vegetable oil three minutes, add a tablespoonful of cornstarch and cook three minutes, stir into the soup, boil up and serve with croutons.

Home-Made Noodles.—Beat two eggs, add salt to season, with enough flour to make a stiff dough. Knead it, then roll as thin as possible. Cover with a towel and then set aside to dry for a half hour. Spread very lightly with flour and roll like a jelly roll. With a sharp knife cut strips about one-eighth-inch thick. Unroll and dry again. Then drop into boiling broth or well-salted water and cook 15 minutes.

Lemon Bavarian Cream.—Take one-half cupful of sugar, one-fourth cupful of lemon juice, two egg yolks, one-half tablespoonful of gelatin, one tablespoonful of cold water, two egg whites and one-half cupful of cream. Put one-half of the sugar and lemon juice into a double boiler; when heated pour over the egg yolks which have been beaten with the remaining sugar. Cook stirring constantly until thickened. Add gelatin soaked in the cold water, beat until cool. Fold in the stiffly beaten egg whites and add the beaten cream.

Spaghetti Plate.—Cook one-half pound of spaghetti until tender. Drain. Mix two cups of chopped cold meat, one-fourth cupful of carrot and celery finely minced. Add two tablespoonsful of flour to one cupful of milk and cook slowly until well cooked. Add one tablespoonful each of lemon juice and chili sauce. Arrange the spaghetti around a plate with the center filled with the meat. Garnish with a sprinkling of chopped green pepper or parsley.

Mushroom Spaghetti Sauce.—Peel and slice one-fourth of a pound of mushrooms and cook in two tablespoonsful of butter for three minutes, remove the mushrooms and add two tablespoonsful of flour; stir and cook until smooth. Add one cupful of liver stock, stirring constantly, add cooked spaghetti and one-half cupful of cream; season to taste. Heat hot and fill the cases or timbales. Garnish with crisp bacon and sprigs of parsley. (© 1931, Western Newspaper Union.)

COOKED MEAT CAN BEST BE STORED BY LOOSELY COVERING WITH OILED PAPER SO AS TO PREVENT TOO RAPID DRYING OUT

BUREAU OF HOME ECONOMICS—UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture—WNU Service.

A good many people have an idea that the best place for meat in the refrigerator is in the compartment with the ice. They also have a notion that the way to keep meat or poultry as it comes from the market is to leave it wrapped up in the paper bag in which it was delivered, and put it right on top of the ice. Neither of these practices is desirable.

Scientific studies of refrigerators of all kinds have been made by the Bureau of Home Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture. These have included testing the temperature of different parts of the refrigerator, studying the bacteriological condition of meat and milk after it has been kept for different lengths of time at various temperatures, finding out the effect of icing with small and large pieces of ice, and a number of other points.

Uncooked meat is a ready medium for the development of bacteria that cause spoilage. A temperature of 47 degrees Fahrenheit or below is recommended for keeping meat in the best condition. Unwrap meat as soon as it is delivered and place it on a clean platter or dish in the coldest part of the refrigerator—next to the

DON'T let a Cold Settle in your Bowels!

Keep your bowels open during a cold. Only a doctor knows the importance of this. Trust a doctor to know best how it can be done.

That's why Syrup Pepsin is such a marvelous help during colds. It is the prescription of a family doctor who specialized in bowel troubles. The discomfort of colds in your system is lessened when it is used; your system is kept free from phlegm, mucus and acid wastes. The cold is "broken-up" more easily. Whenever the bowels need help, Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is sure to do the work. It does not gripe or sicken; but its action is thorough. It carries off all the souring waste and poison; helps your bowels to help themselves.

Take a spoonful of this family doctor's laxative as soon as a cold starts, or the next time coated tongue, bad breath, or a bilious headache, gassy condition warns of constipation. Give it to the children during colds or whenever they're feverish, cross or upset. Nothing in it to hurt anyone; it contains only laxative herbs, pure pepsin and other mild ingredients. The way it tastes and the way it acts have made it the fastest selling laxative the drugstore carries!

BOB WHITE COUNTS NOSES

One, two, three, four—
See, there come a couple more!
Five, six, seven, eight—
Hurry, hurry, you are late!

WHEN Bob White and Mrs. Bob flew over to Farmer Brown's land after the terrible gun of the hunter had banged twice on the land of Farmer Jones where they and their children had been getting their breakfast their hearts were heavy. You see, they knew what those terrible bangs meant, but they knew that their children did not. And so a terrible fear clutched at their hearts, fear that never again were they to all gather together happily.

"The terrible hunting season has begun," moaned Mrs. Bob, "and my darlings do not know how terrible the danger is. Oh, Bob, do you suppose that some of them have been killed already?"

"I hope not," replied Bob. "Perhaps that hunter could not shoot straight. You know, my dear, we have been shot at many times and not hit." Bob said this to make Mrs. Bob feel better, but in his own heart he had little hope. You know, he had been watching and had seen one of the young Bob Whites fall at the first bang of that terrible gun. "I think we are safe here for the present," he continued, "and I will call the children to us."

So Bob began to whistle, not the cheery "Bob White," but the low, low whistle which is a message of gladness to all who hear it, but what the hunters call the scatter call, an anxious note calling his scattered family together. One by one the young Bob Whites answered and the answers came from many directions. Bob continued to call that they might know just where he was, and presently the youngsters began to arrive, very much frightened and not at all understanding what it all meant. Bob and Mrs. Bob anxiously counted noses. Perhaps I should say they counted bills. Fourteen they counted and then counted all over again. But fourteen was all they could make, and then they knew that one was missing. Bob's heart sank. One was surely missing, and remembering how he had seen that one struck down in the air he had little doubt that they never would see him again. Still he would not give up hope and all that long morning he continued to call without once getting a single reply.

Peter Rabbit, sitting in the dear Old Brier Patch, had heard that distant bang! bang! of the terrible gun, and later had listened to Bob calling. As a deeper and deeper note of sadness crept into Bob's whistle Peter knew that something dreadful had happened and his own heart grew and for Peter is very sympathetic.

"Something has happened to one or more of Bob White's family," said he to himself. "The hunting season has begun again. Bob ought to bring his family over here to the Dear Old Brier Patch. It is the only safe place I know of."

Meanwhile little Mrs. Bob had been going about from one to another of her children anxiously inquiring if any of them had been hurt. One she found who had lost a few feathers, for hot, stinging shot had torn the tender flesh. But he was not badly hurt and Mrs. Bob told him that he would soon be feeling all right again.

"Now," said she, "we will stay right where we are while your father keeps watch. If that hunter comes over here by straight to the Old Brier Patch where Peter Rabbit lives and crawl under the thickest brambles you can find. That dog cannot find you there, for he thinks too much of his precious skin to have it torn by the brambles. You have learned how to crawl, haven't you?"

"Yes," said the little bird, "I can crawl. This is all that you can do. This is the one dreadful time of all the year for us. It is dreadful. I never could and never can understand it."

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

"PASSIVE RESISTANCE"

THE most effective action is frequently inaction. While activity is often a tower of strength, inactivity is sometimes just as powerful in its effect, because of the wear and tear of the suspense it creates and the discouragement it engenders.

It is this which is often known as passive resistance, that species of opposition which, though refraining from positive action is none the less forceful in accomplishing results.

The expression was fathered by Hans Victor von Unruh, on November 10, 1848.

The author of the phrase was president of the national assembly at Berlin and the occasion for the use of it was when the body of which he was president was in danger of being attacked by a mob, was offered and rejected armed protection by the National Guard and Gendarmes of Berlin.

THE WHY OF SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

WATER CURES

IN MAINE they say that water dipped from a running stream before sunrise on Ash Wednesday—dipping up stream—may be bottled and kept as a cure for almost anything. In other sections it is rainwater caught on June 1, 2 or 3, or the first rainwater that falls in June, that will not putrefy and can be kept bottled to be used for curing freckles and all skin diseases besides, as any country woman of the old school will tell you, being "dreadful good for the inside."

These are variants of one superstition akin to the belief so common in England of the efficacy of dew gathered on the morning of May 1, and the Continental custom of bathing on Midsummer eve; and have their origin in the worship of Adonis, who was the Babylonian god Tammuz, personification of the annual decay and revival of vegetable life and of the increase of flocks and herds and human beings by means of his quickening waters.

Doctor Frazer, the great authority on mythological lore, who has devoted a whole book to the cult of Adonis, says that a wave of oriental influence, starting probably from Babylon, carried the Tammuz or Adonis ritual westward till it met similar native forms with which it became blended, was crystallized into various shapes under the pressure of the Roman civilisations and "passed with the Spaniards to the New World." Doctor Frazer's researches leave no doubt as to why water bottled early in June is "dreadful good for the inside" or that the worship of Tammuz is unconsciously being perpetuated among us today.

Bulgaria's Many Charms
Because it is remote and because it backed the wrong horse in the World war, Bulgaria has never become the tourist land that even its neighbor Greece has become. Yet the very scarcity of its visitors from the American continent may enhance its attractions for those who do go. Sofia was first colonized by the Roman emperor Trajan. The chapel of St. George in the Jewish quarter first was a Roman temple. The church of St. Sophia dates from the Middle Ages and was a mosque in its Turkish days.

THE WAY TO PROSPERITY

IT is a mistaken idea that prosperity is maintained by lavishly spending money. The folly of this theory is evidenced in the present period of economic depression. The tendency to spend money unwisely during times when it is plentiful has led many persons, especially during the past ten years, to mortgage future incomes. Nothing has contributed more harm to our economic system than the easy method of installment buying. Many persons thought nothing of creating obligations on a monthly payment basis that left little available cash for actual necessities and future emergencies. Few articles were bought for cash. Luxuries were obtained on a "promise to pay" basis. Having created a condition of this sort, it was not surprising (when hard times came and men were thrown out of employment) to find a home well furnished with oriental rugs, expensive radios and other unpaid for luxuries, extending over two automobiles, but with little or nothing to eat and credit temporarily suspended. It is no wonder that a condition bordering on despair was easily created.

The present depression, from which we seem to be emerging, has taught us some valuable lessons. One of these is the folly of mortgaging future incomes by spending money on a mere promise to pay.

The same tendency to spend before acquiring makes impossible the creation of a reserve. The writer remembers an experience in his youth, when as a clerk in a bank during a period of depression, the bank official arrived one morning with two traveling bags filled with currency. Said he, "You now know how to keep a bank safe. Always keep plenty of cash on hand where you can easily get it when you need it." A reserve of this sort can only be created by saving and a rigid practice of economy. Those with a reserve on hand were able to pass successfully through the present depression, whereas those without such a reserve might have met a tragic fate.

Experience is the most valuable teacher. The person who made a mistake might rightly claim an excuse if he acted according to his best judgment, but to repeat the same mistake is an act of unexcusable folly. If our past experience has taught us the folly of spending what we do not possess, is it not the better part of wisdom to begin creating a reserve through the practice of economy and a little self-denial.

TALES... of the TRIBES

By EDITHA L. WATSON

The Blackfeet

The "terrible Blackfeet" are a tribe whose early contact with white men has colored most of the pioneer history of the plains. Tales of their daring, skill, and ferocity are to be found in abundance, so that it is easy to picture them, the terrors of the prairies, ambushing the enemy or hunting buffalo in great bands.

The significance of their strange name is not certain. It may refer to moccasins painted black, such as were worn by the Pawnees and other tribes, or it may have reference to footgear blackened by the ashes of prairie fires, and this latter is the more probable theory.

This is a confederacy, rather than a single tribe, as it consists of the Siksika (Blackfeet), the Piegan and the Kainah (Bloods). They probably included about half a hundred bands. Each of the three divisions had its own chief and council, and held its own Sun dance. The Atsina and the Sarai were allied tribes.

The Blackfeet have been called "the most dangerous banditti of the mountains." They were always found with weapon in hand, eager for a fight. The young men went to war to acquire horses and the means to set up a lodge and become leaders in the councils, while the older men fought for the love of battle and to add to their prestige.

Blackfeet legends mention a time when they had neither horses nor guns, and hunted on foot, but it was their acquisition of these that caused them to become the "terrible Blackfeet." Horses were stolen from other tribes with great audacity, and Washington Irving relates a story showing their boldness. Some Blackfeet went into a Nez Perce camp and cut the horses loose where each had been tethered by one foot before the lodge of its owner. The Nez Perce were all asleep except a party of gamblers, who were so engrossed in their game before the fire that they paid no attention to anything else. One of the raiders, his blanket drawn close, actually stood near the Nez Perce, watching the game for some time, unnoticed by them. Finally, mounting some of the horses, the Blackfeet drove the rest ahead of them, and yelling derisively, galloped the Nez Perce herd off to their own camp.

The Blackfeet territory included the upper part of Montana and north to the Saskatchewan river. The six or seven other tribes whose ranges adjoined theirs, especially the Crows, were their bitter enemies, but some of them held the Blackfeet in great respect, and they were not often aroused to attempt retaliation for the constant harassing to which they were subjected.

Smallpox, measles, and starvation (due to the government cutting down rations at a season when game was unusually scarce) reduced the number of the tribe materially in later days, but in modern times they are reported to be increasing in numbers and prospering. At present they are settled on reservations in Canada and one in Montana, and have been publicized until they are one of the best known tribes of modern times, who enjoy their limelight and play up to it cleverly.

It was a Blackfoot, Two Guns White Wolf, who was selected to pose for the Indian head on the buffalo nickel. He and his band often travel over the country and lend "native color" to important gatherings.

The Siksika must not be confused with the Shosone, or Blackfoot Sioux. This is a part of the Teton Sioux, whose range was southeast of the Siksika. They and the Hunkpapa were responsible for many of the depredations along the Platte river. This band, however, was small and could not compare in any way to the "terrible Blackfeet."

Children Know Good Peanut Butter

YOUNGSTERS say, "Be sure to get Monarch Peanut Butter. It tastes just like peanuts." Monarch Peanut Butter is made in spotless clean kitchens by clean workers from the finest grade of selected Virginia peanuts. Every particle of "skin" and bitter germ or "heart" is carefully removed. The result is a delicious, smooth spread for bread or toast that has all the natural taste and flavor of good freshly roasted peanuts. More than 250 Monarch Super-Quality Foods are sold and recommended by 50,000 Independent Grocers.

The Welsh are protesting that Welsh should be accepted if a foreign language or code is permissible.

Avoid Burns from Mustard Plasters

When you have Rheumatic or Muscular Pains in the back, chest or limbs or if you have a cold coming on, try this simple treatment. It is more convenient, safer, cleaner and more effective than mustard plaster.

Get a bottle of Hoff's Liniment and apply it with brisk rubbing. Then saturate a cloth with Hoff's and apply to the painful area and in a few minutes you will feel the warming and stimulating effect of this powerful liniment.

Hoff's is different from ordinary liniments that are applied with rubbing alone. It brings a quick flow of blood to the affected area, reducing congestion and relieving pain. Get an eight ounce bottle of your druggist today for 60 cents. If you do not get relief in 30 minutes he is authorized to refund your money. Goodrich-Gamble Company, St. Paul, Minnesota.

For TEETHING troubles

FUSSY, fretful . . . of course babies are uncomfortable at teething time! And mothers are worried because of the little upsets which come so suddenly then. But there's one sure way to comfort a restless, teething child. Castoria — made especially for babies and children! It's perfectly harmless, as the formula on the wrapper tells you. It's mild in taste and action. Yet it rights little upsets with a never-failing effectiveness.

That's the beauty of this special children's remedy! It may be given to tiny infants—as often as there is need. In cases of colic and similar disturbances, it is invaluable. But it has every-day uses all mothers should understand. A coated tongue calls for a few drops to ward off constipation; so does any suggestion of bad breath. Whenever older children don't eat well, don't rest well, or have any little upset, a more liberal dose of this pure vegetable preparation is usually all that's needed. Genuine Castoria has Chas. H. Fletcher's signature on the wrapper. Doctors prescribe it.

RAISE ALL YOU CAN FOR YOUR OWN USE

Long time planning for unemployment relief in Indiana has been under discussion, and is possibly a serious thing in the larger centers. The one solution offered is the planting of small crops and vegetables in cities and towns using every available vacant lot for production, to be cared for and harvested by those out of work, with the idea of both current consumption and winter storage.

In practically every community, vacant lots will be pressed into service as in the war days, and in larger centers unemployed will be provided with free seeds for planting and cultivating.

Take for instance towns like St. Joe and Spencerville, this situation is not alarming because the raising of garden truck has always been a hobby of the rural citizens and they look forward to the time when they can get into the garden making business, but in cities many of the people do not know how or where potatoes come from, and no doubt a training school will be necessary for many. But that will afford more labor.

Anyway, folks out of work should get busy and plan to take care of their own, and not simply wait for the return of the old job. This condition exists only in large centers.

Obituary

DONALD FALES KIMES
Donald Fales Kimes was born October 30, 1902 at Coburntown, Indiana, and died in the Hospital at Ann Arbor, Michigan, March 26, 1931, aged 28 years, 4 months and 26 days.

He was reared in Spencerville and spent nearly all of his life here. He was educated in the schools here.

He was united in marriage to Miss Minnie Willmot June 7, 1922 and to this union three children were born, Robert Gene, aged 6, Rose Ann, aged 3 and Donna May, 8 months. He leaves to mourn their loss his wife, Mrs. Minnie Kimes, and children, his father, mother, one brother, Walter, besides uncles and aunts and many relatives and friends.

He was received by baptism into the Lutheran Church at Spencerville when a young boy at the proper age. He was of an excellent disposition and had many friends. He was devoted to his family and his chief concern was to provide for them and make them happy. He was sick a long time, more than a year and suffered more than is common to people. His sufferings are ended and he rests in peace.

The funeral was held from the Lutheran Church, Sunday afternoon, conducted by the Rev. Steffey, of Deer Creek, Indiana, and Rev. G. D. Stoll, local pastor. Burial was made in White City Cemetery.

CARD OF THANKS

To our friends and neighbors who gave to us all that human kindness could suggest for help and comfort in this our dark hour of sorrow, in the death of our loved one, we extend our heartfelt thanks.

Mrs. Donald Kimes and Children,
Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Kimes and Brother.

Donald had been a sufferer for the past year and his condition baffled many of the best physicians in the country. For several weeks he was in the hospital at Auburn and then Fort Wayne, after returning home he continued to follow medical instructions. At times he would be relieved from his suffering, so that he could work some.

Some weeks ago his parents decided to go to Ann Arbor for an examination and Donald was eager to go with his father and wife. After an examination it was decided that a tumor on the brain was the cause of his suffering. The family returned to Spencerville and prepared to return for an operation.

Donald and his father returned, and the operation was performed and disclosed a tumor on the brain and the fibers were completely interwoven about the brain. He passed into unconsciousness and never rallied. After death came an autopsy which revealed another larger tumor between the forehead and brain. No help could possibly have been given and the parents have the satisfaction that they did every thing possible for relief.

Tumors are as a result caused from severe injuries and in conversation with the family they could remember an instance of ten years ago, when Donald was swimming, and in making a dive from the board he struck a stone with his head, and it gave him some trouble at the time, and there is no doubt but what this instance was the direct cause of his death.

Donald was athletically inclined, and at no time could the family trace any injury to his head.

Brief but Significant

A man who held the belief that after a youth had attained his majority he should be taught to fend for himself gave his son a sum of money and told him that henceforth he would have to earn his own living.

The young man did no work, but spent a riotous few months abroad, and then found himself almost penniless.

His sole desire was to get home, and he decided to send a wire.

He found he had only money sufficient to pay for a message of four words, so, after considerable thought, he telegraphed to his father, "Patted calf for one!"

"Father" of Lawn Tennis

To Major Wingfield must be given the credit for first realizing that lawn tennis could be utilized to the needs of society. If he was not the inventor of the game he did, however, deposit specifications in 1874 to obtain a patent for "a new and approved portable court for playing the ancient game of tennis." The first balls used were india rubber and were uncovered. The rackets were wooden frames and pear shaped. The oval-shaped racket was not used until 1880.

Test for Hearing

The usual test for determining the question of how well a person can hear is the ordinary speaking voice test, given at a distance of 20 feet; and the whispering voice test given at a distance of 10 feet. These tests are given so that the examiner can determine the ability of the person to repeat words which he has given at 20 feet and whispered at 10 feet. The tests mentioned are merely average tests, and ear specialists employ more accurate methods.

Underground Church

The picturesque crowd, the variety of costumes and the scene in the open market place at Sarajevo on market day baffles description. One of the quaintest in all Yugoslavia is the little Serbian church in Sarajevo built in the sixteenth century after the Turks had overrun the country. It was sunk below the level of the street so its roof would not be visible from without and hidden behind a high wall to avoid suppression by the Mohammedans.

Corn silage alone is not a satisfactory roughage for fattening lambs. It may be made to supply 90 per cent of the total roughage and still keep the lambs in a good physical condition. ### ODORIFEROUS LINES TO A SPRING UNION

Ah, little onion, growing there Side by side with flowers rare, Than rose to me you are more fair:

Lovely little onion!

How proudly there you lift your stalks

Amid the posey-bordered walks;

We'll know who ate you when he talks:

Potent little onion.

How tenderly, how faithfully,

Your fragrance clings so close to me;

It still remains while others flee—

Fervent little onion!

When you've grown to larger size, I'll greet you then with tearful eyes:

Your pungent virtues still I'll prize:

Healthful little onion!

The Altona M. P. Church property is advertised for sale by the trustees, for April 1st. The building is a cement block structure and is sufficiently large for Altona. It has been some years since the church has had regular services, while the Butler Center and Reoboth churches, the other two points of this circuit have not been without services.

The Loyal Happy Hustlers class of the Church of Christ held a meeting Thursday evening at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Leslie Meek. After a short devotional and business period, games and contests conducted by the hostess were enjoyed by all. A bountiful pot luck supper was served to which all did justice. The class will meet again the third Thursday evening in April.

All-steel houses, without a rivet or a bolt in them, will be manufactured as the newest innovation in home construction this year. In announcing the innovation, long research had proven the feasibility of constructing houses in such a manner. The metal sheets, girders and joists will be made and shipped in pieces. In erecting the houses, a special portable type of welding machine will be used. It is estimated that the costs of such construction would vary "from two per cent less to ten per cent more" than in structures of other materials, but an appreciable saving would result due to slow depreciation and low fire insurance costs.

Mrs. Nancy Chaney entertained the C. C. Club at her home on Friday afternoon. One guest was present, Mrs. Ada White, of Auburn. Prizes were won by Mrs. Zelpha Steward and Mrs. Maude Beams.

The Young Ladies Social Club very pleasantly entertained the members of the St. Joe Bunco Club at the home of Mrs. Lehr Wilder of Coburntown on Friday evening. The guests winning prizes were Mrs. Nava Hursh and Mrs. Edith Cole. The other prizes were won by Miss Gaylon Markle, Miss Bina Zimmerman and Mrs. Zelpha Steward.

WHAT IS YOUR GOAL IN STARTING BABY CHICKS?

(By Prof. W. B. Krueck)

The most important factor in deciding the cost of producing a dozen eggs is the number of eggs laid per hen per year.

This is determined largely by the time that the pullets start laying in the fall of the year. The highest producers, usually start laying in October or November.

Poultrymen should keep these two factors uppermost in their minds in starting baby chicks this spring: Too many people are buying their chicks entirely upon a price basis. How can they expect to reach the above goal if they start with a poor foundation?

A saving of four cents per chick at the present time may look like a 40% saving in the investment in chicks. However, the goal which the poultryman should have in mind is good pullets in the fall of the year and this saving of four cents may represent very little saving, if any, in the cost of producing a good pullet for his laying house.

Good poultrymen would give considerably more for pullets from good quality chicks than pullets from inferior chicks. Furthermore, if the poultryman will normally think of the influence of mortality in increasing the cost of chicks, he will give serious consideration to the quality of chicks with which he starts. It would be a sad mistake for a great many of our communities to resort to less efficient hens after so many efforts have been made by the County Agents and the Poultry Extension Department of the various states in trying to build up and improve the quality of poultry in the average community.

Keep your goal in your mind. It is not a question of more hens, but more efficient hens for greater profits in the poultry business.

PUBLIC WORK OPENS UP IN THIS COMMUNITY

To one who has lived in this section of DeKalb county, possibly one of the most prosperous sections, for the past few years, and if he will take a retrospective view of this section, many unbelievable improvements have come to pass within the course of a few years, and today we are entering upon a new era of local improving that is almost unbelievable.

The road situation has possibly undergone as much change in the past ten years as anything else, and with this comes other improvements.

Mud roads were everywhere, later came the hauling of the land tax under the supervisor and this was a help to our rural communities, next step was the payment of land tax in cash and the township building gravel roads where needed, the next step was making the roads to meet certain specifications and then turning them over for county maintenance, all of which showed marked progress in the road building program of our entire county and state.

The problem of county maintenance on the trunk line roads over the county brought forth other problems of expense, until today the hard surfacing of these roads has become a necessity and not a luxury as some believe.

This week the dreams of the public spirited citizens are being evidenced, when the Tri Lake Construction Co., Columbia City, broke ground for commencing of the paving of the St. Joe-Spencerville road, from the Widney Corners, half mile east of St. Joe to the Allen County line.

Mr. H. G. Bollinger, who is secretary of the company, is superintendent of the construction and Mr. C. E. Bollinger, of Elkhart, is superintendent of the grading.

The work was started Monday morning on the east end of the road, and traffic has been detoured past the Widney and Leighty orchards and into the west end of town for the present.

County highway superintendent, E. E. Turner, is on the job, doing his best to figure out the best possible detours for the people and the towns of St. Joe and Spencerville.

At St. Joe, Mr. Turner reports the B. & O. railroad turned his proposal down flatly for a detour from the west end, or at the Iona Woodcox property east, along the north side of the B. & O. tracks, to come out at the depot crossing, thus affording a very fine inlet to town during the construction period. Mr. A. H. Woerner, division engineer from Garrett, stated that the company would be assuming unnecessary responsibility by permitting this detour, and furthermore it would interfere to a certain extent with the company business on the team track.

In conversation with Mr. Bollinger, he stated that if there is no serious handicap in the work that everything would be in shape to pour cement by July.

The three bridges on the road will be taken care of at once. Walter Sitten, of Garrett has the contract for the Bear Creek and the Erick bridges, while Merritt Butler has the contract for the bridge near the Spencerville cemetery, and he began work Monday.

A number of local laborers have been taken on and more will be needed when the job opens up to a greater extent.

In addition to the road work the Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., have two gangs here moving their high line and poles to the new road line. The crews are from South Bend and are composed of the following men: Fred Rickert, foreman, Walter Coffman, Ed Koehler, George Wise, Wm. Coffed, Robert Quinn, Elmer White, Victor Fouch, John Freeman, Paul Perkins, Delbert Stein, Slim Dover, Augie Paul and Augie Deering.

The Bell Telephone Co., and the local company will have men at work moving their lines to the new property, all of which consumes labor if not locally.

Our own incorporated town will be compelled to make some changes and additional improvements in order to make the desired appearance of a finished paving through our streets.

Three other gravel roads are

W. C. GEE KILLED BY MOTOR CAR

(Ashtabula Star, Fri. April 3)

William C. Gee, 71, of 4124 Cleveland Ave., for 20 years a barber in Ashtabula, was injured fatally at 9 P. M. Thursday when struck on Route 20 at North Madison by an automobile driven by Charles T. Hammond, 539 W. 40th St.

Mr. Gee was dead when received at Geneva Community hospital. A broken neck was given as the cause of death.

Another accident had preceded the one in which Mr. Gee met his death.

He was returning from the Geauga Maple Festival at Chardon with his son, Walter E. Gee, 102 Riverside Drive, and grandson, Linwood Gee, when the automobile, driven by Walter Gee, struck Marvin Nelson, 47, of Ft. Chester, N. Y., who was walking along the road.

Mr. Gee stopped the car, his father and son getting out to walk back to Nelson. As they stood talking with the man, waiting for Walter Gee to back the car, Mr. Gee was struck by the Hammond car.

Mr. Hammond said he did not see the men at the side of the road.

Lake county sheriff's deputies who investigated said Nelson also was struck by the Hammond car, escaping both accidents with slight bruises.

An ambulance was called from Madison and Mr. Gee was taken to Geneva Community hospital where he was pronounced dead. The body later was removed to the Leo Brown funeral home on Prospect Road.

Mr. Gee came to Ashtabula 20 years ago, and 18 years ago established his barber shop at 131 W. 46th Street. He had formed a wide acquaintance in the city during his business career.

He was born in St. Joe, Ind., and came to Ashtabula from Conneaut where he was in business 20 years.

Mr. Gee is survived by his wife, Mrs. Levern Gee, one son, Walter; two grandsons, William H. and Sherman Linwood Gee; a sister, Mrs. Nina Hadsell of Hicksville, Ohio, and a brother, Laney Gee, of St. Joe.

Mr. and Mrs. Laney Gee and Mr. and Mrs. Chas. H. Curie and son left early Sunday morning enroute to Ashtabula, Ohio to attend the funeral which was held Monday at 2 P. M. They went via Akron, Ohio, where they called at the E. R. Zimmerman home, having received a telegram Saturday telling of his death and the funeral at the same hour Monday as Mr. Gee's. Mr. Zimmerman is a cousin of Mrs. Gee. They returned Tuesday via Cleveland stopping to call at the home of another cousin, arriving home about 6 P. M.

CLUB PLANNING ON MONTHLY PEST HUNT

Another meeting of the Fish and Game Club was held Thursday evening at the town hall, and 35 interested men were present.

The membership campaign showed such interest that they thought best to continue the drive until the next meeting when the results of the two sides will be announced.

As a monthly feature it was decided to inaugurate a pest hunt. A committee composed of Lester Coburn, Harvey Kimes and L. B. Meek, was selected as a points committee. They will determine what pest will be allowed killed and the points or credit allowed for the month.

At the monthly meeting a prize will be awarded to the high point man, of a value not to exceed $2 and at the close of the year a trophy of $10.00 value will be given to the high point man.

OBITUARY

Ruth Irene Bishop, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Bishop, was born in Jackson Township, DeKalb County, Indiana, on March 25, 1913, and passed out of this life into the great beyond at St. Joe, Indiana, on March 30, 1931, at the age of 18 years and 5 days.

She leaves to mourn her departure her parents and six sisters: Mrs. Carl Johnson of Fort Wayne, Mrs. Laura Warstler of Auburn, Mrs. Ada Warstler of Jackson Township, and Opal, Zella and Frances at home; the grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Armstrong of Jackson Township. Besides these a host of relatives and friends.

Ruth confessed her faith and was baptized on July 3, 1921 under the pastorate of Rev. J. R. Elson, and as she grew older her faith grew firmer. Ruth was a lovable girl and possessed a beautiful and earnest Christian spirit. So appreciative of the things which only have true value. One by one in the infinite meadow of heaven.

Evening Fairy Tale for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

When Mrs. Coal had been given to Joan, she had taken the kitten into her arms, and had said: "Oh, you precious black kitten. Why, you are as black as black as well—as black coal."

"I know, I shall call you Mrs. Coal. That will be your name."

And so the name had always stuck to the kitten, and now that she was a big cat the name seemed to suit her very well.

Whenever anyone asked the name of the cat and heard that she was Mrs. Coal, no one was in the least bit surprised, the name almost seemed made for her.

And another thing, which Joan said showed how much Mrs. Coal did approve of her name, one of her favorite places in the house was in the old coal bin.

Often Joan would go to look for Mrs. Coal and there on top of the coal bin she would be sitting, her green eyes the only part of her showing a color different from the coal.

And of course no one could tell if Mrs. Coal was dirty or not from sitting in the coal, but just looking at her—though Joan naturally suspected that if she had been sitting in the coal she would be pretty dirty.

But Mrs. Coal was very fussy about herself and kept herself looking fine and clean.

Now one morning Mrs. Coal was missing. Poor Joan did not know what to do.

She looked in the coal box and there was no Mrs. Coal. She called through the house.

"Mrs. Coal, Mrs. Coal," and then she burst out crying.

Never before had she called for Mrs. Coal that from somewhere or other the sound had not come of: "Meow, meow, meow."

Mrs. Coal Was So Happy Too.

But this time not a sound came.

"Where has Mrs. Coal gone. Where could she have gone?" asked Joan of everyone.

But no one had seen Mrs. Coal all day.

Joan spent a wretched time. What could have happened? She knew Mrs. Coal would not want to worry her.

Frankfurts Popular, Easy to Cook

Almost everybody likes frankfurts. They are easy to cook, especially for a large number of people, so they are often used for picnics, community suppers and similar gatherings. A good extra dish in which frankfurts are used is suggested by the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture. The quantity given in the recipe below is suitable for a family of about six persons.

1/2 pound spaghetti 1 cup canned tomato puree
2 quarts water 1/2 cup salt
1 tsp. salt 1/2 cup water, or
1 lb. chopped onion 2 cups tomato
1 pound frankfurts 2 tbs. butter

Cook the spaghetti in the water for about 30 minutes, or until tender. Drain well and mix with the tomato. Cook the onion in the butter until lightly browned and mix with the spaghetti and tomato. Wash the frankfurts, barely cover with boiling water and simmer for ten minutes. Put the spaghetti and tomato on a hot platter, lay the hot cooked frankfurts on top, garnish with cream or chopped parsley and serve at once.

The spaghetti mixture may be placed in a greased casserole, the cooked frankfurts laid over the top, covered, and heated until the sauce bubbles. Serve from the dish.

Setting It Straight

For the purpose of setting the record straight, we hereby set down what was one of Kin Hubbard's best, best-known, and much misquoted, much stolen paragraph: "Tell Binkley arrived at the poorhouse in his $3,000 limousine too late to see his mother die."—F. P. A. in New York World.

Bolero Suits in Fashion Picture

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

The woman coveting "lines" which are youthful, yet not too youthful, will find in the bolero suits, which are so up in vogue this season, just what she is looking for—a young-figure silhouette.

It is indeed a far cry from the severely tailored manish suit to types such as the little cloth costume in the picture the soft feminine styling of which is its charm. The tendency for the silhouette to trend away from stereotyped form to lines of gentle grace is notable this season, especially in the suit realm where the jaunty bolero in all its versatile moods is injecting a refreshing note of youth.

The promotion of the cape theme is also exercising a marked influence throughout the mode this season. Add the two together, the bolero plus a cunning cape effect, and the result figures a sum-total of chic for the spring suit as ultra, according to the model in the picture, as any college girl might envy. The fact that the capelet and brief jacket are scalloped, all the more emphasizes the departure from the severely tailored.

Very interesting and style-significant, too, is the skirt which achieves its smart flare via many sections of the material which are skillfully seamed together. Skirts which are fitted snugly about the hips with the flare starting about the knees lead among the new silhouettes.

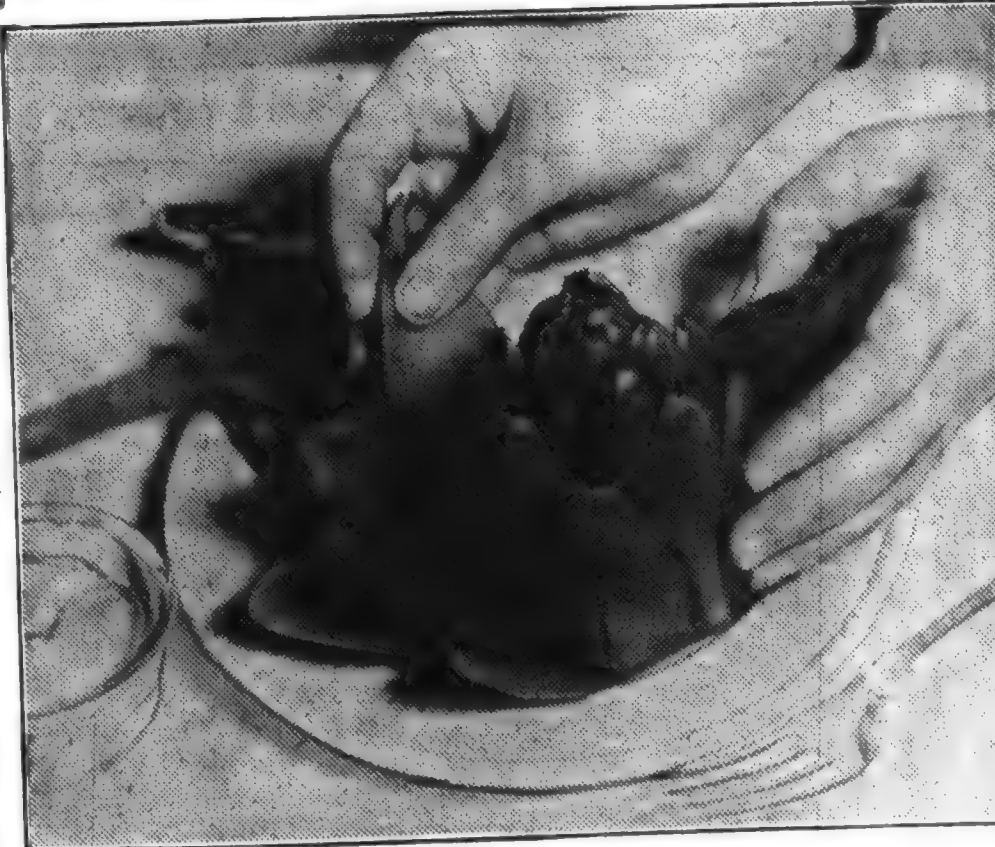

No less important than the jacket suit itself is the blouse which is worn with it. As every woman knows, there's magic in a blouse. In the twinkling of an eye it can change a suit of tailored aspect into as drowsy looking costume as one may have need of during the daytime hours and vice versa. This season, more than ever, designers are playing up blouses with vim, vigor and intriguing artistry.

The sleeveless blouse worn with the suit pictured is of exquisite good taste. The assortment of blouses for spring are bewildering in their diversity of color, fabric and styling. Two types are, however, outstanding—those of plaid or stripes and those of lace. The necessity of acquiring a whole wardrobe of blouses this season is obvious.

As to the lace blouse it may be as frilly and frivolous as fancy can picture, and this type is adorable with the youthful bolero suits. Designers are also very enthusiastic in regard to the new linen lace. Many of the hand-drawn lace of the season's collections are of this type of lace in either natural tint or in any of the pastel colorings.

Globe Artichokes Served With Sauce

How to Serve and Eat a Globe Artichoke.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

Perhaps you have seen in food stores a curious looking green, cone-shaped vegetable, covered with scale-like leaves, called a "globe" or "French" artichoke. You may have wondered what to do with it. Until comparatively recently, in this country, globe artichokes were considered expensive delicacies, served chiefly in hotels and restaurants, although they have been well known in France and other European countries for a long time. An increased supply and more widespread distribution has now brought them, like many other foods that were unknown a short time ago, into our everyday markets.

People are asking whether or not globe artichokes have value as food, and how to cook and serve them. The globe artichoke, says the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture, supplies vitamins A and B and carbohydrates in amount similar to ying peas, as well as other nutrients. It is not to be confused with the Jerusalem artichoke, which is a tuber, growing profusely in many parts of the country. The characteristic flavor of the globe artichoke is liked very much by many people.

In purchasing globe artichokes, plan to serve one to each person, unless they are very large, when the individual artichokes may be cut in half. See that the artichokes are fresh, with a good green color and plump leaves, not dried up or brownish in tinge. As the edible portion is the base of the leaves and the heart to which the leaves are attached, a good artichoke should be thick and broad at the base.

To prepare globe artichokes for the table, wash them in cold water, trim off the stems and remove a few of the outer leaves. Drop them into lightly salted boiling water and cover and simmer for 20 or 30 minutes, or until the central part is tender. Test by pulling off a leaf. Artichokes are usually served with drawn butter or hollandaise sauce in a small individual dish beside each plate. As the leaves are pulled off they are dipped in the sauce, one by one, and eaten from the fingers. The flower center or hairy portion, growing out of top of the heart is discarded, but the bottom or "cheese" is considered by many the choicest part of all.

Spanish Sandwich.—Chop enough green pepper and onion to make two tablespoons each. Cook until a light brown. In one tablespoon of butter, add a cupful of thick tomato pulp and simmer five minutes. Stir in one cupful of soft grated cheese, one-half teaspoonful of salt, a few dashes of paprika and one well-beaten egg. Cook just a moment and serve spread on finely buttered toast—cover with another slice.

Little Girls Like Short Sleeves

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

"Mother, can't you cut the sleeves off this old dress? It's so hot today, and all the girls are wearing short sleeves."

Even a five-year-old may be stimulated to make a protest like this about her clothes when the first warm break comes after the bleak whiteness of March. You may try to point out that all the cool days are by no means over, but more likely you give thoughtful consideration to the long-sleeved winter dress your child is wearing. To begin with, some kinds of sleeves might possibly be cut off halfway between the elbow and the shoulder and finished with an invisible hand-sewn hem. That would give the child more freedom for climbing and playing ball and other games in which she uses her arms.

Then you observe that your little girl's dress is several inches too short—a condition which is bound to grow worse as time goes on. The hem must come down perhaps to the very edge. Obviously a few new and larger dresses will be needed very shortly, for this and other let-down dresses

Fathers Poor Housekeepers

Fathers make poor housekeepers, according to Dr. F. G. E. Hill, medical officer of Morley, England, in a recent report. In Morley many women are being employed in textile mills but there is little work for men. Therefore many mothers of infants and children go to work while the men care for the home and little ones. "Neglect for domestic duties, lack of comforts and a lower standard of food preparation and cleanliness results. Such factors must inevitably affect the health of the developing infants and children," says the doctor.

"Little Stories for Bedtime"

by Thornton W. Burgess

Wisdom is the knowledge gained
And then to daily life applied.
He wisest is who learneth most
And from the truth ne'er turns aside.

WISDOM OF BOB WHITE

PETER RABBIT never is accounted very wise and probably never will be. This is because Peter is very apt to forget what he has once learned. He is heedless, and heedlessness and wisdom never go together. Now Bob White is different. There is a great deal of wisdom in that pretty little head of his. He doesn't need to learn a thing but once.

"One lesson is enough for me," says Bob. "Life is too short to spend time learning the same thing over again. No one will get a chance to shoot at me more than once if I can help it."

So as soon as he had made sure that all his children but the one whom he had seen fall when the hunter fired his terrible gun were safe he called them about him to give them some advice.

"You all heard the terrible noise over there in the wheat field where we were getting out breakfast, and

"That Noise Was Made by a Firestick Called a Gun."

I have no doubt that every one of you was dreadfully frightened. One of you was hurt and I fear that your missing brother was killed." Bob's voice was very sad as he said this, and little Mrs. Bob's eyes filled with tears. "That noise was made by a firestick, called a gun, in the hands of one of those two-legged creatures called men. He was trying to kill us, though why he should I haven't the least idea. It is a kind of madness that breaks out among men at this time of year and lasts for a few weeks. Not all men have it. I am thankful to say, but enough have it to make this danger of the fire-sticks greater than all other dangers together. You see the fire-stick, which is called a gun, kills while yet a long way off. So remember that whenever you see a man with a gun you must on no account let him know where you are. Hide and keep perfectly still as I have already told you to do. If he does find you and you get safely away as you did this morning, never go back to the place where he found you until this season of madness is over. No matter how hungry you are and how plentiful the food may be there, don't go. He is sure to come back again and again to look for you. It is better to suffer hunger than to suffer from torn flesh and broken bones, or perhaps be killed.

"Now that hunter found us over in that wheat field this morning, so we will not go over there again for many weeks. We will stay right in this field where we are unless a hunter comes here. If one does we will fly to the Old Pasture where the bushes are thick. The food is not so good there, but the bushes will protect us from the terrible gun. On no account go over to that other field or like your poor lost brother, you may never return again. In this terrible season when you have found a safe place stay in it. Why that hunter has not come over here I don't know, but he hasn't and so we are safe here for the present. I saw that boy of whom we saw so much in the garden this summer over here this morning and he had no terrible gun. I begin to think that he is really our friend and has not got the hunting madness. Perhaps he has had something to do with keeping that hunter away from here. I hope so. I rather like him and I should hate dreadfully to see him with the hunting madness, especially after all we did for him in his garden in the summer. I would like to trust him, but I have learned that few of those men creatures are to be trusted at this time of the year. Now run along and fill your stomachs, but don't go beyond that fence. I am going to whistle some more so that in case your poor brother is still alive he may find us."

So the young Bob Whites scattered to hunt their delayed breakfast and once more Bob White began to call.

WHY DO WE CALL THEM "GYPSIES"?

EVER since we were old enough to read and enjoy stories, most of us have thrilled to tales involving those wandering people known as Gypsies.

While the origin of this race is now fairly well established to have been in central Europe, there was a time when there was much conjecture in this regard and when the Gypsies were thought to have come from Egypt.

It was on this account and at that time that they became known as Gypsies, the term having been applied to them because of the land of their supposed origin.

The Old Gardener Says:

THERE seems to be a general impression that the real Scotch heather or ling can be grown successfully only in Scotland. This is a mistake. Scotch heather grows well in many parts of this country, and there are a dozen different forms, ranging from common purple to pure white. Heather is an acid soil plant and will not thrive where lime or fresh manure is used. It needs some protection and makes a good ground cover under shrubs. As a rule it gets somewhat winter-killed, and the tops should be sheared back each spring. Inasmuch as heather is rather difficult to move, potted plants should be purchased. With this fact kept in mind, there is no reason why heather should not be grown in amateur's gardens.

THE WHY OF SUPERSTITIONS

By H. IRVING KING

LOVE AND THE PEACH TREE

AMONG the various survivals of tree worship existing in this country is a superstition mentioned by Mrs. Bergen in a Memoir of the American Folk Lore society which superstition is as follows: Go out at midnight and walk around a peach tree repeating:

Low for a foreigner,
Bark for a near one,
Crow for farmer—
Scream, tree, scream if I'm to die first.

This is to be tried by a young lady who desires information as to whom she is likely to marry, or to know whether she is to die unmarried. If, after she had invoked the tree, she hears a cow low, a cock crow or a dog bark, or instead the trees "scream," she has her answer. Mrs. Bergen gives the invocation merely but adds in a note that presumably the tree is to be circled "sunwise," that is in the direction of the hands of a watch.

This presumption is hardly warranted as direct tree worship seldom, if ever, involves the ritual of sunworship. The peach tree superstition is analogous to several other forms of tree worship surviving in Europe. For instance before dawn on Good Friday the Bavarian peasant goes out to his orchard and prays to the trees saying: "I pray, oh, green tree! that God may make thee good," a formula evidently changed from a prayer to the tree to one for it, and at night they run about among the trees crying "Budd, oh trees! or I will fog you." When prayers failed with their gods the ancients used to try intimidation. In Devonshire the farmers take a barrel of cider to the orchard and throw cups of it at the most fruitful trees chanting:

"Health to thee, good apple tree,
Well to bear pocketfuls, basketful.
Old Tanser in his 'Hundred Points of Good Husbandry,' says that in order to be fruitful all trees must be 'was-abled'—that is treated as the Devonshire farmers treat their apple trees.

SCIENTIFIC VALUES

THE visit of Professor Einstein to this country is justly regarded as a most important event in the scientific world. He has lectured before learned audiences in many of the universities, but it is doubtful if his theory of relativity is any better understood than when it was first announced. Interesting as were both his visit and his lectures, it should not be forgotten that this great man of science represents only a comparatively small segment of the world of actual experience. No one would attempt to belittle the importance of scientific values.

L. A. Barrett.

Science has given us our antitoxins, new and improved methods of treatment of disease. It has conquered many horrors of the sick room. It would seem that even a cure of that dreaded disease of cancer may at any time be announced. Many of the comforts of our homes are also debts we owe to scientific research. While the automobile has become an economic necessity, its origin is attributable direct to the engineer's laboratory. Science has displaced many of these things which our fathers thought were the very necessities of life. It would have seemed to them incredible that our Twentieth century would see airplanes, telephone communication—spoken—between Europe and America, the radio, and a score of other privileges which were not even dreamed of a hundred years ago, with television just around the corner.

No thoughtful person would attempt to undervalue all these contributions of science. It should be stated, however, that the ultimate and most lasting as well as the most satisfying realities in life are neither given to us by science nor are they dependent upon scientific investigation. Professor Einstein will be succeeded by some one else and his celebrated theory of relativity either improved upon or discarded altogether; but the "constants" in life are realities not of the mind but also of the heart. Among these realities are the power to appreciate art, to interpret music, the spirit which lays the foundation for success in life in terms of integrity, honesty and fair play. The spirit which establishes the home and sacrifices for children, these realities are not the product of scientific laboratories. What is the higher power? Henry Drummond called it the greatest thing in the world—Love.

LIME NECESSARY IN STOCK RATION

Tests Show Need Is One Per Cent Per Animal.

How much lime is needed in an animal's ration? This is one of the most frequent questions asked about animal feeding.

Harry Steenbock, and his associates at the University of Wisconsin, have now demonstrated that the greatest amount is 0.5 to 1.0 per cent of the ration, expressed in terms of calcium carbonate.

Of all the vitamins that have been isolated and studied by nutrition workers, vitamin D, the factor responsible for lime assimilation and the deposition of lime in the bones, has attracted the most widespread interest because it is the vitamin most likely to be lacking in the ration of farm animals and in the diet of humans. For years fundamental studies of the nature of vitamin D and the factors responsible for calcification in the animal body have been under way at the Wisconsin agricultural experiment station.

Recent findings of Steenbock and his co-workers regarding factors in certain foods which interfere with the normal process of lime assimilation in the body add support to theories advanced by the noted English research chemist, Mellanby. That these factors can be much reduced in power by specific treatment of the foods before including them in the animal's ration has been thoroughly demonstrated in the Wisconsin studies carried on this past year.

By subjecting rolled oats, wheat, corn and rice to heat treatment Steenbock found that the calcifying properties are improved.

Great Damage Done by Warble Fly in Summer

The other day a merchant who dealt in long leather shoes bought a steer hide from a wholesaler. When it reached his shop and he started to cut it into the longest strips he could he found out why it was he had been able to get it for 35 cents per pound, as compared to the price of $1.50 which had been asked for the same quality leather unblemished. Well up on the rump a large brand had been burnt in the hide, burnt almost completely through the skin, while along the back were several tell-tale holes, the work of the warble fly. Branding is no doubt a necessity for ranchers whose stock roam the open range, but why cannot the mark be placed on the neck or other less valuable part of the hide than the rump or side. With regard to the warbles most farmers are by now aware of the trouble which they cause cattle during the summer when on pasture, and the lowered value of warbled hides, and many make half-hearted efforts to eradicate the flies by squaring the grubs out of their animals' backs.

Experiments in Feeding Beef Calves for Market

Live stock growers and feeders are interested in cutting the cost of production of the market animal. One of these methods is to use as large a portion of roughage as possible to replace the higher priced grain feed. With this thought in mind a number of experiments in feeding beef calves for market have been conducted at the Michigan state college. It has often been said that the production of baby beef is a special project which requires expert knowledge of cattle feeding. This tradition has been most repeatedly when these vigorous youngsters have outstripped the older cattle in the feed lot. It is an outstanding fact with any class of live stock that the younger the animal the more pounds he will add to his weight on a given amount of feed.

Overworked Horses and Mules Need Treatment

In the spring, when the temperature is 75 to 90 degrees Fahrenheit, soft mules and horses are quite easily overworked and may sweat excessively, give out and sometimes develop very rapid breathing, rapid heart action and show nervous symptoms or become sleepy, drowsy and sluggish. When such cases begin to show signs of exhaustion take them out and rub them down. In the heat of the day, they may be bathed all over with tepid or warm water, then rubbed dry. A little cool water may be applied to the head. Such sick horses or mules should not be fed until they are cooled out and rubbed down. Then give a little feed.

Pure Breed Sheep

Man who breed pure bred sheep must of necessity have at least three flocks at this time of year. Don't leave the ram and ewe lambs together too long. First, because you must permit these ewe lambs to bring a lamb at one year old. The lamb is seldom of much value and the ewe is stunted for life. Another thing if a lamb resulted how would you register it? The answer is such a lamb is not eligible to registry because you can't be sure of the sire.

Wakeful restless CHILD needs Castoria

WE can never be sure just what makes an infant restless, but the remedy can always be the same. Good old Castoria! There's comfort in every drop of this pure vegetable preparation, and not the slightest harm in its frequent use. As often as Baby has a fretful spell, is feverish, or cries and can't sleep, let Castoria soothe and quiet him. Sometimes it's a touch of colic. Other times it's constipation. Or diarrhea—a condition that should always be checked promptly. Just keep Castoria handy, and give it promptly. Relief will follow very promptly; if it doesn't you should call a physician.

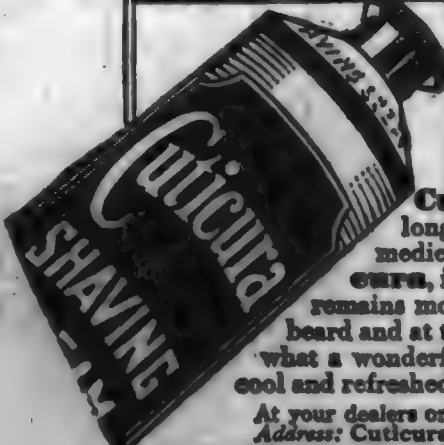

All through babyhood, Castoria should be a mother's standby; and a wise mother continues it in more liberal doses as a child grows up.

Lesson for April 12

THE PRODIGAL SON

LESSON TEXT—Luke 15:11-34.
GOLDEN TEXT—Likewise, I say unto you, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.
PRIMARY TOPIC—What to Do When We Do Wrong.
JUNIOR TOPIC—What to Do When We Do Wrong.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Father's Welcome to the Wandering Son.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Church and the Repentant Sinner.

The center of interest in this parable is not the prodigal nor his brother, but the "certain man who had two sons." He who fails to see the heart of our Father God will miss the purpose of the story.

I. The Son's Estrangement From the Father (v. 12).

There is every indication that this was a happy home, but a demon entered in and stirred up discontent in the heart of the younger son. He became tired of the restraints of home. His desire for freedom moved him willfully to choose to leave home—to throw off the restraints of a father's rule. Sin is essentially the desire to be free from the restraints of right authority and for selfish indulgence. At the request of the son "the father yielded unto him his living."

II. The Son's Departure (v. 13).

Having made the fatal decision, he went posthaste to the enjoyment of his cherished vision. He quickly got his goods in portable shape. Having thrown off the restraints of his father's rule, he eagerly withdrew from his father's presence. This is always the way sin works. Adam and Eve after they had sinned hid themselves. The son could not now stand the presence of his father so he hastened away, having "gathered all together."

III. The Son's Degradation (vv. 13, 14).

He had a good time while his money lasted, but the end came quickly. The indications are that his course was soon run. From plenty in his father's house to destitution in the far country was a short journey. The sinner is soon made to realize the futility when such powers as ministered to his pleasure are burned out.

IV. The Son's Degradation (vv. 15, 16).

Having no friends to help him when his money was all gone, he was driven to hire out to a citizen to feed swine. It was a tragic change from being a son in his father's house to feeding swine in the far country. It is ever so. Those who will not serve God are made slaves to the Devil to do his bidding (Romans 6:16). How vividly this portrays the history of many men and women about us, and yet it is the picture of the inevitable consequences of sin.

V. The Son's Restoration (vv. 17-24).

1. "He came to himself" (v. 17). Upon reflection he was made conscious that though he had wronged his father and ruined himself, he was still a son of his father. In the days of his sinning he was beside himself. The sinner continues in his sin because he is insane. The world calls the sinner who leaves off his evil ways crazy, but in reality he has just become sane.

2. His resolution (v. 18).

His reflection ripened into resolution. The picture of his home, where even the hired servants had a superabundance, moved him to make a decision to leave the far country and go home.

3. His confession (vv. 18, 19).

He acknowledged that his sin was against heaven and his father, that he had forfeited his right to be called a son, and begged to be given a place as a hired servant. The sinner not only should make a resolution—he should confess his sin.

4. His action (v. 20).

Action was needed. Resolution will not avail unless accompanied with action. When the confession is genuine, action will follow. Good intentions will not avail.

5. His reception by his father (vv. 20-24).

The father had not forgotten his son. His unchanging love followed the son all the time he was away, and longed for his return. He must often have looked for him, for he saw him when he was a great way off. So anxious was he for him that he ran to meet him and fell upon his neck and kissed him. So glad was the father that he did not even hear his confession through, but ordered the tokens of honor to be placed upon him, receiving him back into a son's position.

TALES... of the TRIBES

By EDITHA L. WATSON

The Zuni

In that shadowy past which is so long ago that only legend reminds us that it was at all, an Indian people came from the northward and settled in the Zuni valley. Later, from the West came another people, and these joined the first settlers. This was the beginning of the Zuni tribe, which is one of the most interesting tribes of the Pueblos.

At the dawn of their recorded history, they were living in seven cities, which were known as far south as Mexico. Perhaps Indian traders, journeying to far places with the products of their villages to exchange for the shells of the coast or the parrot feathers of the South, told of their seven cities, and, as has always been the custom of travelers, exaggerated a little. At any rate, these vague rumors reached the ears of Fray Marcos de Niza, who made his famous exploration trip in 1539. He listened to all that the Indians along the way could tell him about "Cibola" (Zuni), and finally saw one of the villages from a neighboring hill, but instead of entering the settlement, where he might have been disabused of his notions, he returned to Mexico with a great narrative of the magnificent "Kingdom of Cibola."

The Indians along the way had assured him that this was a wealthy country, and that its seven cities were filled with gold and precious stones. Hence, Coronado, the next year started North to explore this unknown land of which so many glowing tales were told.

The Pueblos had a way of sending messages by fleet runners, whose speed and endurance were the wonder of the Spaniards. News reached the first Zuni city (Hawikuh), of the coming of these strangers from the South, and of their warlike tendencies, and upon its receipt the Zunians became active, with the result that after storming the town, the Spaniards found that women and children, and most of the movables in the place, had been taken away. The mesa stronghold of Tasiyalone (Corn Mountain or Thunder Mountain, as it is variously known), which commands the Zuni country, was their refuge, and the warriors who had defended Hawikuh fled there also, leaving a deserted and empty pueblo to the disappointed invaders.

Coronado found that the "Kingdom of Cibola" was a small country containing seven pueblos, all within four leagues, the largest of which contained 500 houses, and that the immense treasure of rumor was a sorry myth. In fact, he wrote that Fray Marcos had "said the truth in nothing that he reported."

Zuni at this time must have been at its zenith. There are no records of more than the seven pueblos, and history shows that these deserted into oblivion one by one, until six of them have become uninhabited ruins.

Forty years after Coronado's disappointment, Chamuscado visited the tribe, and in 1538 Espejo went to Zuni. He reported that he found there some of the Mexican Indians who had been with Coronado, and that there were but six cities, so that evidently one had been abandoned since Coronado's time.

Three Spanish priests established a mission at Hawikuh in 1629, and this was the first mission in the "province of Cibola," although one had been attempted previously. In 1622, the Indians killed two priests, one who had been sent to them, and one who was passing through Hawikuh on his way to another tribe. Fearful of consequences, the Zuni again fled to Tasiyalone, their refuge in all troubles, and lived there for three years.

In 1670, an enemy tribe raided the village of Hawikuh, burned the church and killed the missionary. This town was probably not recaptured after the raid, and by the time of the Pueblo rebellion of 1680, the Zuni were living in three towns, two others beside Hawikuh having been deserted.

The rebellion of 1680 was participated in by almost all the Pueblos, the day being set and plans made, and the news spread by runners. The Zuni were as active as the rest, and after killing the missionary who remained among them, they once more hurried to Tasiyalone, and made it their home for twelve years, until Diego de Vargas reconquered the country in 1692.

After this, Zuni was one city. It was rebuilt on the ruins of Hawikuh, on the Zuni river, one of the original Seven Cities of Cibola.

Even yet, there was unrest among them. Once more a missionary was killed, and once more the mesa stronghold was their refuge. However, peace was finally concluded, and from 1713 on there was not much to record in the history of Zuni. For some time it was entirely abandoned by the white people, and became a thoroughly Indian town again, but in later years the United States government established a school and built extensive irrigation works, so that the Indians began to become educated in the white man's ways of peace.

FOR COLDS—ALKALINIZE YOUR SYSTEM

Doctors everywhere are prescribing this new treatment for colds: Begin when you feel a cold coming. Take a tablespoonful of Phillips' Milk of Magnesia, morning, noon and night, the first day. Do the same second day. Then only at night. Colds reduce the alkalinity of your system. That's what makes you feel achy, feverish, weak, half-sick. Phillips' Milk of Magnesia is alkali in harmless, palatable form. It checks the symptoms of colds by restoring the alkalinity of your system. Relieves sour stomach, indigestion, gas, over-acidity. All druggists.

CHAPTER IX—Continued

He came down with a crash. His head struck the desk and his pistol fell from his hand and went bounding along the floor toward the door. The man lay stunned and still. Sir George, as the bank manager turned, put his finger to his lips and indicated that he was to sit on the fallen bandit and tie him up.

Still keeping himself below the glass of the partition and away from the doorway, Sir George picked up the pistol and crawled on the desk nearest the main office. Again thanking his stars for his height he stood erect and peered over the partition.

Paralyzed by the sudden appearance of three men without warning, the clerks had been backed up against the wall by one robber, while the second thief, who also had a pistol, was rapidly sweeping the money, stacked near the teller's window, into his pocket.

This man turned swiftly as though he had eyes in the back of his head. As he turned he fired. The shot struck the partition a few feet to one side, as Sir George ducked and fired. His bullet hit the man's pistol hand and as the pistol dropped and the man reached for it, Sir George winged him again, this time in the leg. The third man near the door swung his pistol away from the clerks and clients he was holding at bay, but Sir George fired first. The fellow yelled and dashed outside to a waiting machine. Sir George jumped down from the desk, ran through the doorway into the main bank and hurried toward the doorway. But the men in the car had started, and as he emerged, one of them fired. The bullet went through Sir George's coat sleeve.

The car started across the bridge, racing dangerously, despite the shouts of the few people on the street. From the back of the car came a succession of shots that discouraged pursuit. Sir George hurried back into the bank. The manager and the assistants were still dazed—hardly able to believe that what happened had happened—despite the wounded men and the blood on the floor.

He managed to caution the manager: "Not a word to the police or anyone else about the payroll," before a small crowd came in. Presently the wounded men, still unconscious, were taken to a heavily guarded motor, going to the nearest hospital, while Sir George was making his way up the river road at top speed.

Once across the bridge, he whistled, and as arranged, August, MacBeth's chauffeur, came and took the car. "I'm not coming in yet. I'm going for a walk up the towpath. Tell Mr. MacBeth that."

"Yes, Sir George," said August, and gazed after him so intently that Sir George had to check his inclination to feel his waist and see whether the belt was bulging. What was wrong with August? He could not possibly guess his errand.

August, who had been instructed early this morning by MacBeth that he was to take the car at once, and say and do nothing to delay Sir George, was too awestruck to tell him that a wild tale of adventure had come over the telephone. An excited neighbor, who had been down at the drug store and had seen the police arrive, had called up to assure Lady Sandilands that her stepson was all right and described the fight as reported in the village. As it told nothing in the reporting and nothing from Aggy's indignant recital, Robert MacBeth had listened with some anxiety and Robert with open amusement.

"Think shame, Roberta," said her aunt, indignantly. "The lad might have been killed." "But he wasn't," Roberta reminded her, "and if you think I believe anything like that happened in this sleepy place, you're mistaken. Somebody's 'having' you. There isn't the slightest doubt of that, Aunt Aggy. Sounds like one of Roger's romances, and we'll have 'Heavenly Sandilands himself' sauntering in to join in the laugh."

Her aunt glared at her. "It passes me, Roberta," she said, with a sudden sweetness that made her brother observe her carefully, "why you go so far out of your way to belittle the lad. It's my private belief that you're as fond of him—as the rest of the ladies."

Roberta flushed, an ugly dull flush, but she looked steadily at her aunt. "No auntie, you can take your long-legged liddle safely back to Bonnie Scotland as soon as you like for all of me."

Her father, who had—and it was unusual for him—let them have their say without interruption, now came back from some far-off place in his mind and said, "I'm sorry to say it's very apt to be true. I gave the lad a job at the bank this morning. But no one could guess this would happen. By the Lord I wish I knew where the leak was! When I find out there will be trouble."

Roberta stared at him. "Do you mean to say, Father, that you believe all this impossible story about him holding one robber by the feet, while he shot the other from over the partition? And leaving them lying where they fell, ran out and single-handedly stopped a car full of desperadoes who were shooting right and left?"

Her father turned a wary eye on her. "Well, Roberta, I dare say that there has been some little exaggeration, but as he's a very tall man, with a very long reach, and better than all, as he has a good Scots head on top of his shoulders, it's possible."

"Were you expecting him to come right back to you, Robert, or what?" demanded his sister.

"I left that," Robert MacBeth said rather sullenly, "to his discretion."

Roberta laughed again. "Oh, he's discreet enough, Father. You're safe in trusting his discretion, as far as his own skin or interests are concerned."

"Lady Sandilands fixed her niece with a steady eye. 'I'm no so sure. It's no discretion the Sandilsons family have been famed for. Far, far from it. Where is he now, Rob MacBeth?'"

"How should I know?" MacBeth countered irritably. "He can, as you say, look after himself."

But in his own mind he was thinking with an anxiety that amazed him. Why doesn't he come home, since his program has been cut to pieces?

Sir George went slowly up the towpath. He was not easy in his mind. He had not allowed for an open attack on the bank this morning, concentrating the attention of the public and the police on him.

Some one had undoubtedly given the other side a hint, and it had evidently been their aim to get the money before it left the bank. The question was, since that attempt had failed, did they know he was scheduled to collect the payroll money from the bank today?

It was a difficult problem, for if the desperate gang really knew his errand he would be doing a very foolish thing in walking up the towpath alone. He found it hard to believe that they could know positively and was fully persuaded that the chances were against their conceiving that he would venture alone with such a sum of money on his person. Anyway, Ray Browne was on the lookout. He was not really alone.

He was exceedingly troubled by the fact that his mind continually swung round to the thought that Roberta might be tangled up in this. Why it should be did not quite understand, except that his suspicion of this man who had been lurking about her continued to worry him. Her attitude of distrust and some of her hints as to that some one was slandering him, but who would take the trouble, and why, he could not comprehend.

All the way up from the bank to the bridge and after August had taken the car, as agreed, and his walk up the towpath had begun, he had been wondering whether he was a wise man, or a fool persevering in his folly. His doubts returned to him now strongly. Suppose he was not met by Ray Browne, as they had planned?

He decided that his imagination was working overtime because he was hungry. He took out a package of sandwiches which Lady Sandilands had had the cook prepare for him and unwrapped one. Slowly walking along, one hand in his pocket, resting against a pistol, he began to munch it.

There was something like joy in his heart, for here in this quiet place, where he had least looked for it, adventure had come, and might even now be lurking round the next corner. He looked ahead sharply and then behind him.

In front nothing, but behind him a canoe was coming along the canal, propelled by swift strokes. He marched steadily on until he came to

His heart glared at her. "It passes me, Roberta," she said, with a sudden sweetness that made her brother observe her carefully, "why you go so far out of your way to belittle the lad. It's my private belief that you're as fond of him—as the rest of the ladies."

a little bridge which spanned the canal. He walked under it, close to the stone wall of the embankment on which it rested. He could see both up and down now. He took out another sandwich and began eating it.

The canoe came beating in at the young man in its twist around, looking about him. He realized then that, where he was, he was well hidden and the canoeist must come closer to see under the bridge. The man stopped paddling. Up and down he looked, shading his eyes with his hand.

Sir George had a strong feeling that this was a scout looking for him. He determined to find out. He walked from under the bridge to the middle of the towpath. He could have sworn that his movements were without noise, yet something was overhead or seen by the man in the canoe, for looking back Sir George saw he was being directly hit. Quickly the canoe began to turn about to go back down the canal.

Sir George had also used his eyes and he felt confident that the man was the same dark-haired fellow he had seen with Roberta that night on the towpath. Unless he was also very much mistaken he was also the youth who had died in the canoe the night of the party and if he was, then somewhere, at some time, Sir George had known him.

It was decidedly odd and suspicious that he should turn up here and at the first glimpse of Sir George scurry away. It might, of course, be that finding him here, the fellow was simply hurrying back to find Roberta alone. Time would tell, but as time counted in this game and Sir George had a good stiff walk to the trying place, he hurried on.

As he turned his back on the canoe and its occupant he knew in a flash, and positively, who the man was. His mind's eye pictured the deck of the steamer he had taken from Central America. Jack Navarro! Why had he been so stupid all this time? That only snake would be the very man to poison a girl's mind against him.

Halfway between the island and the construction camp another quaint little bridge crosses the canal. Here Ray Browne waited.

Browne sat near the bridge beside his car smoking a cigarette, and rising every few minutes to survey both towpath and canal. After each survey he sank back in his chair, keeping an eye on the road. Presently he saw Sir George running along the towpath. Instantly he started his engine running.

Sir George flung himself into the car with hardly a word of greeting. "Get on with it, and don't stop to talk. I'm hot and bothered. I think I've been followed. There's a fellow in a canoe who could easily land anywhere on the bank near the road and inform a waiting motor."

Ray started the car, and once on the road, he began to show what he knew about speed, and it was not until they had passed several miles in their journey that Ray asked:

"Safe now, isn't it?" "Nothing's safe until the workmen have the money in their pockets. The bank was held up this morning."

"What?" Sir George nodded. "Once around this point and I'll tell you. But when they were round the point there was a motor car, obviously placed so as to block the road, while out on the canal bank, looking up and down the towpath, were three men. Without hesitation Ray, who knew the road well, ran up on the bank, passed around safely and went on at full speed. They glanced back and saw the men running toward the car.

Ray and Sir George looked at each other.

"That lad I saw in the canoe has spread the news that I'm headed up the river. It doesn't look healthy here to me."

"Say no more."

The road seemed comparatively safe going, and Ray took a more cheerful view of the situation. Sir George did nothing to discourage him.

They caught the sound of a motor boat on the canal. There was nothing, Sir George told himself, frightfully unusual in a motor boat coming along the canal, but when a shot came from the motor boat and by the narrow margin missed their rear tire, he judged that he had an unusual motor boat.

"Zigzag," he shouted. "Where do your guards begin?"

"Round the next curve."

Luck held—at least long enough to allow them to rock around the next curve.

A car was waiting there, with one of the workmen seated in it. Sir George waved a hand, and as they went by, the car followed and Ray called, "Don't start anything, Luigi, but if they do shoot at their tires."

A cheerful "Alla righta" followed them.

Movement to Preserve Forests Traced to 1873

Following the Civil war settlements sprang up throughout the West. Wood in greater and greater quantities was needed and louder than before the note of alarm was sounded. We were using up and burning our timber with frightful rapidity. From Europe scholars were returning, says Forest and Mankind. They told how France, Germany, and other countries were able to have the penny and the cake both; how they were able to cut timber from their forests year after year and still have increasing quantities.

In 1873 a committee of forestry of the American Association for the Advancement of Science presented a report to congress stressing the importance of preserving our forests and in answer to this the first significant step forward was made by the federal government. It appointed a forest agent to investigate conditions. Later this position expanded and grew into the division of forestry.

"Romantic" Music De Bakker's "Music and Musicians," says: "Romantic: A term like 'classic' borrowed from literature and used as its antithesis. It seems to have been adopted generally about the time of Von Weber's supremacy. Thus Beethoven and Schubert are alleged to have been Romanticists although they are undeniably classic and Schumann considered himself the apostle of Romanticism."

Earthquakes

Crack in Filled Ground Caused by Earthquake in Japan.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

THE occurrence of a destructive earthquake such as that which recently practically destroyed the city of Naples, New Zealand, sets the world to thinking of and perhaps to fearing these devastating tremors. It is wrongly assumed by many people that an earthquake is likely to occur at any place.

Up to 1903, it is computed by an eminent scientist, Comte de Balthore, there had been 139,782 recorded earthquakes. In later years, when more accurate records have been kept, they have averaged about 60 a year. There is comfort to the dwellers in most of the world to know that 94 per cent of recorded shocks have occurred in two narrow, well-defined belts—one called the Mediterranean, with 53 per cent of the total, and the other the Circumpacific, with 41 per cent—while the remainder of the world has only 6 per cent, widely distributed.

The United States has been singularly free from recorded seismic disturbance, perhaps the most disastrous being in 1811, when a very severe shock occurred in the Mississippi valley south of the Ohio, which was felt in New York in one direction and in the West Indies in another. This earthquake changed the face of the earth. A vast extent of land was sunk, lakes were formed, and even the course of the Mississippi river was obstructed for a time.

Most of the earthquakes occurring of late years can hardly be classed with the great ones of history. Nearly all of the destruction from recent quakes has been caused by uncontrollable fires. In the more stable zones long periods may elapse between shocks, as for instance, in Kingston, Jamaica, 215 years intervened.

Exactly what is an earthquake and what causes it?

Superficially the name itself tells the story. It is no more nor less than a quaking of the earth or a part of it; and theoretically any vibration at all fills the bill, from the tremor caused by a heavy truck passing along the street or a blast in a nearby quarry to the most violent convulsion that slides hills from their bases and opens yawning chasms in the earth.

Waves in the Earth. But going beyond the superficial, there is more that needs to be said even by way of a bare definition of an earthquake. The key lies in the man experiences it is the coming to the surface of waves in the earth. These waves cannot be compared simply to the up-and-down waves of rippled water nor to the back-and-forth waves in the air that make sound.

Even the simplest wave motion is none too easy to understand; and the waves in the varying earth materials that make themselves known to man as earthquakes are probably the most complex waves that exist. They are at once motions "up-and-down" like sea waves; crosswise like the waves in a flapping flag; back-and-forth like sound waves or the motion in a long coiled spring suspended with a weight bobbing at its end; and in addition may have twists about imaginary pivot lines in all of the three dimensions.

The earth waves originate in some region down in the earth and start out in every direction. The waves from a pebble dropped into a pond, from growing circles on the surface of the water. But the waves in the earth being in a solid, attempt to form spheres that constantly grow outward. Soon, however, because of the difference in the rigidity of different rock materials, the form is not a sphere at all but a very irregular curved solid instead, more nearly that of a potato, perhaps.

The two principal types of earth waves, those that travel like the pulsations in a bobbing spring, straight out, and those that travel like ripples and the waves in a flag, with a sideways motion, move at different speeds. The pulsing waves are the swifter, and of course the place where they make themselves felt first and most strongly is the surface area straight above their starting point. This is technically the "epicenter" or "epicentrum."

The pulsing waves around the epicenter alternately push up the surface of the earth and everything on it, and let them fall back.

When the Waves Combine. The "sideways" waves follow along immediately after the first pulsing waves, and the two, with perhaps "twisting" waves as well, then operate together. The ground in the epicentral area, therefore, gets innumerable thrusts and falls at and the same time is jerked sideways and back for tiny distances in every direction.

At points some distance from the epicenter the pulsing waves strike the surface at a slant and so accentuate the effects of the "sideways" waves and create new surface undulations. The shaking at the epicenter, too, throws the earth's surface there into undulatory waves like ripples on a pond, and these also travel outward in widening circles. These surface waves are those of greatest motion but least speed. They register the heaviest vibrations on the seismographs of the world.

The second important question in regard to an earthquake is: What starts the waves? No one has ever seen an earthquake wave start outward from its center, and it is safe enough to say that no one ever will. But science has built certain hypotheses about the matter that seem to account satisfactorily for the happenings, and which are accepted pretty generally.

Hold a dry stick as big as your thumb in your hands and bend it until it breaks. At the snap, waves will travel to your hands and usually give you a quite a painful sensation.

Hold an iron bar by one end and strike the other sharply with a hammer. Again the vibrations carried to your hand may be violent enough to produce a stinging pain.

And if you should strike a small explosive cap with the end of a long rod grasped by the other end, the explosion would probably bring the same painful tingle to your fingers.

Breaks Start Most of Them. It is generally believed that earthquakes waves flow from a point where one of the three forces illustrated is suddenly released—a break, a blow or an explosion. Breaks are credited with the responsibility for most earthquakes. It is believed that because of slow contraction or shrinking which may result from the cooling of the outer portion of the earth or because of pressure from deposited slits, strains are set up below the surface like those in the bending stick. Eventually the strain reaches the breaking point and there is a snapping of the rocks which send violent waves to the surface, causing earthquakes.

The blow type of earthquake is probably less important. Such a blow might result from the falling in of a great cavern, but probably would cause only a local shock. A more important cause of a blow might be a slipping of one mass of rock over another with a collision at the end of the slide. Such a blow often follows a break, the two acting together.

Earthquakes in active volcanic regions may often result from explosions of gases far beneath the surface; though many times there seems to be an intimate connection between earthquakes and volcanoes, the law regarding them has not been established. Some remarkable coincidences have been observed in late years, however. The terrible cataclysm of Mount Pelee, which, on May 8, 1902, almost instantly killed 30,000 inhabitants, was preceded by the earthquake which in January and April of the same year, wrecked a number of cities in Mexico and Guatemala. The distance between these points is at least 2,000 miles, showing how deep-seated must have been the disturbances, if, as has been suggested, there was communication between them. The great San Francisco earthquake was preceded only two days by one of the most violent eruptions of Vesuvius recorded in many years.

It is also a significant fact that the fuming island off the coast of Alaska, called Bogoslof No. 3, appeared at almost the same time. A reverse cut, visiting this island, was astonished to see that the mountain, or hill, some 400 feet high, on the island, had disappeared.

Shell pioneers great step forward in motor fuels

Perfects new fuel amazingly high in the anti-knock value modern engines need . . . AT REGULAR GASOLINE PRICE

SHELL has succeeded—after months of effort! Today Shell offers a new fuel high in the precious quality that all cars need—the quality most ordinary gasoline lacks.

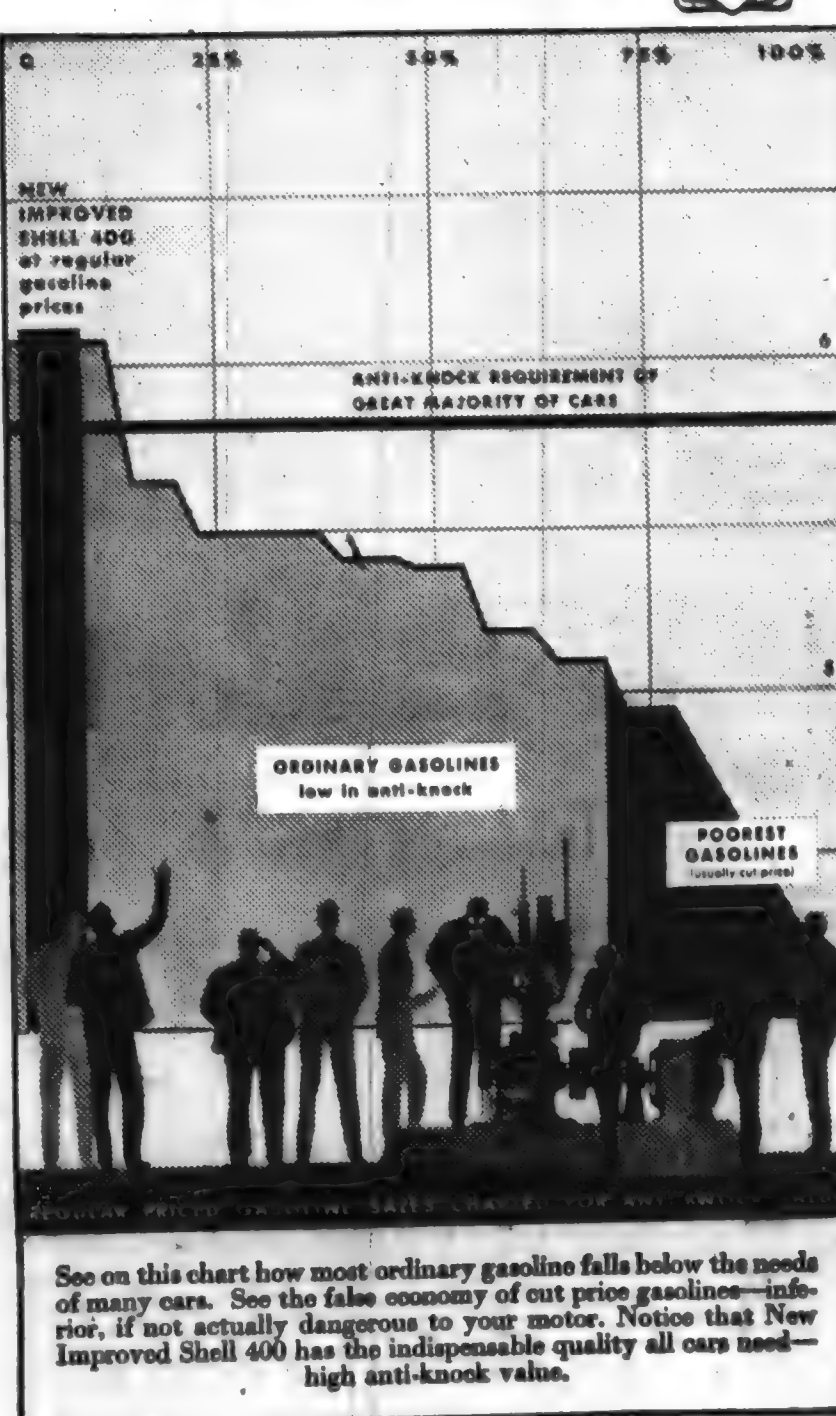

Study this chart. Note that most of the ordinary gasoline on the market falls below the needs of the great majority of all cars. But note that New Improved Shell 400 is far higher in anti-knock value than the ordinary fuel.

Best of all, it costs you no more than the ordinary kind!

Now you can be safe once and for all against motor ills and damage caused by gasoline that knocks. Shell acts to give you the kind of gasoline your car ought to have—at the lowest possible price. In the interest of low cost driving, Shell pioneers this great step forward in motor fuels.

You may be getting the kind of gasoline your engine should have. But millions, as this chart will prove, are putting up with poor motor operation, getting less power and facing higher repair bills than they should—due to incorrect gasoline.

Make a test of New Improved Shell 400. Try one complete filling of it—at least 10 gallons. Ask about the nation wide mileage test. Enter it, today.

BETTER HOMES WEEK APRIL 26 TO MAY 2, 1931

Mrs. Ruth Butler will head the committee and direct the 1931 Better Homes campaign in Spencer-ville, Indiana.

The local program is a part of the nation-wide campaign to bring about more attractive architecture, landscaping and furnishing and better construction for small homes. This program is sponsored by Better Homes in America, the organization which was initiated in 1922, with Herbert Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce, as chairman of its board of directors. Mr. Hoover continues his interest in this important work by serving as honorary president of the organization. Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, Secretary of the Interior, is its president, and Dr. James Ford, executive director.

The Better Homes movement is cooperating with the President's plan for the stimulation of home building and home ownership, as outlined in his statement to the planning of that conference, which met on September 24, 1930.

Sunday, April 26 at both Spencer-ville churches, the ministers will endeavor to emphasize in their sermons "religious training in the home."

Tuesday evening, April 28, there will be a program at the school building where all subjects discussed will emphasize ideals that will help to make good homes better. The topics to be discussed are as follows: Home Ownership; Congenial Atmosphere in the Home; Literature for the Home Library; Music in the Home; Understanding Parents; How Home Economics Teaching Helps Children to Share Responsibility in the Home; Home Standards Responsible for Community Standards; Wise Use of Leisure in the Family Group. The speakers will be persons that are well prepared to talk on the subject assigned to them and they will be announced next week.

Committee:
Mrs. Pauline Baumgartner.
Mrs. Claudia Hafner.
Mrs. Ruth Butler.

LIFE HISTORY OF ISAAC MEESE IS CLOSED.

On April 3, 1844, a baby boy was born in a home near Canal Fulton, Ohio, this baby was named Isaac Meese; when a lad he moved with his parents to Indiana, settling on a farm north of St. Joe on the Auburn-Newville Pike, here as a lad he labored, and suffered the hardships incident to the lives of our early settlers.

When the Civil War cloud overshadowed our country and the call for volunteers came, Mr. Meese at the age of 18 enlisted in Co. H, 88th Indiana Volunteer Infantry which was mustered into service August 29, 1862 and assigned to the Army of the Ohio. He proved to be an efficient, hardworking soldier for his country, taking part in many of the engagements of the Kentucky and Tennessee campaigns, Atlanta campaign, the March to the Sea, thence northward to Washington D. C. and received an honorable discharge June 7, 1865.

After his discharge he returned to the farm and in 1867 was united in marriage to Amanda Melton, to this union five children were born, three dying in childhood;

Frank, residing in St. Joe, and a daughter, Mrs. Bertha Henderson of Albion, Michigan, survive him.

About 43 years ago Mr. and Mrs. Meese moved to St. Joe, Mrs. Meese died here in 1910, and Mr. Meese lived continuously in the house in which he died during all these 43 years.

Many years ago, under the ministry of Rev. Mr. H. B. Sherman, he was converted and became a member of the Church of Christ at St. Joe.

His last months were filled with much mental and physical suffering, continuing until his death, April 8, 1931, having reached the ripe age of 87 years and 5 days. He was the last of his family, three brothers and three sisters having preceded him in death. Near relatives surviving besides the son and daughter are: five grandchildren, nine great grandchildren, and one great great grandchild.

St. Joe will miss his erect, alert, figure from her midst, but can rejoice in the belief that he has gone to a happy and profitable reward.

May we say: "Soldier rest, thy warfare's o'er." And may each of us say with him—"I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith."

The funeral services were held from the Church of Christ Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock, conducted by Elder J. O. Rose, of Angola and interment was made in Riverside cemetery by E. R. Kinsey.

The American Legion had services at the funeral home and at the grave side.

CARD OF THANKS

The family wishes to thank the citizens of St. Joe for their kindness shown during the continued illness of their father and for the beautiful floral tributes expressing their esteem.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Meese,
Mrs. Bertha Henderson.
Mr. Fred Meese, &
Mr. Fairfield Meese.

TOWNSHIP CONVENTION CONVENED LAST SUNDAY

The Concord Township Sunday School convention was held Sunday afternoon and evening at the Lutheran Church, and Mrs. Grace Dilley was chosen to head the organization for the next year. The other workers selected were:

Vice Pres., Mrs. Lena Meek.
Secy.-Treas., J. C. Hull.
Children's Supt., Mrs. Mayola Kinsey.

Young People, Cleota Morr.
Adult, Frank Johnson.
Educational, F. B. Leighty.
Administrative, H. G. Hersh.

The afternoon audience was small, due to the funeral, but the program was of interest.

The evening program was sponsored by the young peoples department under the leadership of Cleota Morr, and the high school furnished the music. Ward Jackson delivered the evening talk on building a life and Miss Rose Smith gave the dates of county activities for the coming year.

LANDS ANOTHER JOB IN MICHIGAN

O. D. Baker & Son, local road contractors, landed a four mile gravel road job in Michigan last week, located south-east of Hillsdale. The contract was secured by $11.02 under next to low bidder, and in all there were 21 contractors submitted figures on the job.

The new firm has been busy securing men of experience to operate their machinery and their personnel is now composed of Wm. Fruit, Fort Wayne, as grade foreman, and for eight years was superintendent for the O'Conner Co; Glen Harrell, Fort Wayne, and Berrien Wheeler, Auburn, as tactor men, and Ford Carper, Auburn, will have charge of the Maney scrapers.

The company began work Wednesday by moving their outfit to near Branch, Michigan.

They already have a number of good contracts and with a couple more, will have work enough for the entire season.

SENIOR PLAY WAS VERY WELL PRODUCED.

A well filled house greeted the St. Joe High School seniors, on Friday evening, of last week, to witness their presentation of An Arizona Cowboy, a four act drama. This class of '31, has sustained the reputation of the St. Joe High Schools, for the manner in which their graduating classes render things in the way of amateur dramatics.

The plot of the play, western, as its title suggests, was good, and its interpretation by these young people, was good.

There was about the right mixture of tragic and comic, to keep up the interest of the audience throughout the entire rendition. Costumes were well selected, as regards the characters they were supposed to represent.

Between act specialties were introduced by local talent, some of whom have attained a reputation of being first class amateur entertainers and whose efforts in this line never disappoint. Taken all in all, we can in all truthfulness say it was as good a performance as has been given by any high school class, graduated from our township. Much credit it due to the performers, and especially to Mrs. LaVonne Devore for the highly efficient manner in which she drilled the pupils of the class of '31, which made possible so excellent an entertainment.

MAKE THIS 10 gallon test

Here are lower driving costs, far better car performance, for millions of motorists

MOTORISTS everywhere are making this amazing test. It may bring you far more satisfactory driving, far lower car upkeep costs. Here are the facts.

Shell has pioneered a great change in gasoline. It has perfected a new, remarkably high anti-knock fuel. The New Improved Shell 400!

In anti-knock value, the quality all cars now need, this gasoline is far above the ordinary type of motor fuel. Yet it is offered you at the same price as the ordinary kind.

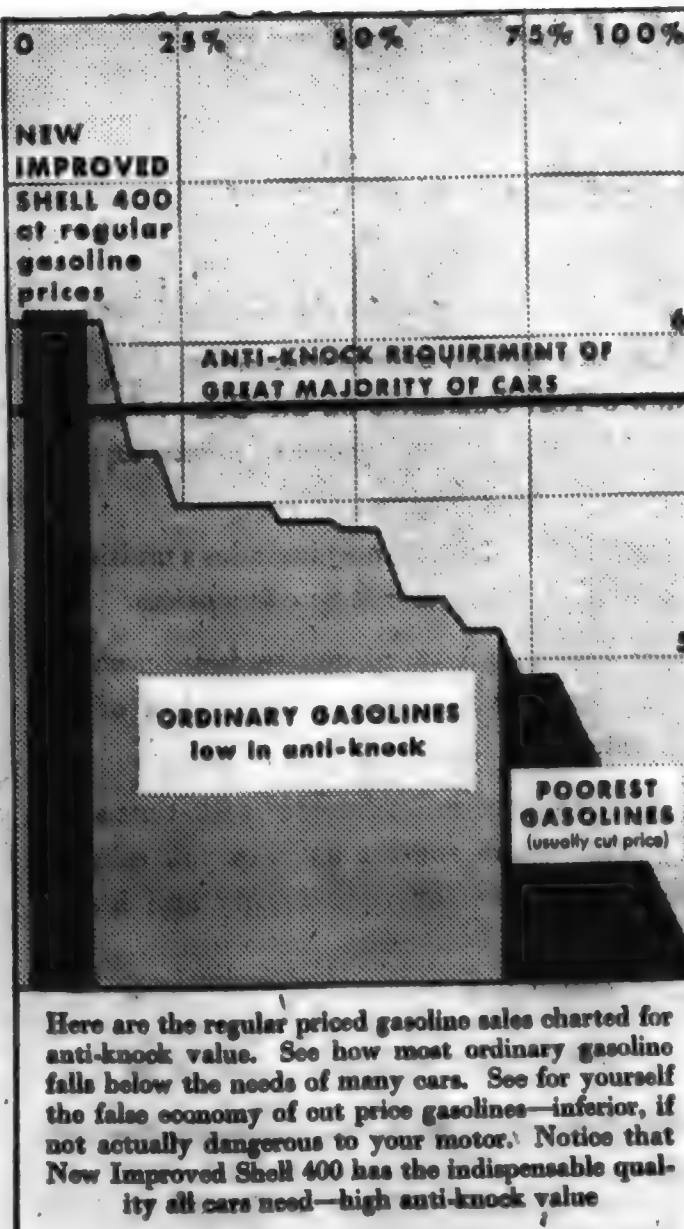

New Improved Shell 400 is Shell's contribution to the cause of low cost motoring. Shell believes motorists are entitled to the real economy, the great improvement in car operation which this new fuel makes possible.

Notice on the chart how much of the ordinary gasoline is below the needs of the modern engine. This fuel was good enough for the engines of years ago—but not up to the needs of the motors of today!

Shell does not ask you to accept its claim of this new, high anti-knock value. It does urge you to try for yourself this fuel developed by Shell research. Prove the facts, in your own car!

Get 10 gallons of New Improved Shell 400. Drive in traffic, on hills, under heavy loads. Let your own motor decide.

Ask your Shell station man about the nationwide mileage test. Enter it, today.

NEW IMPROVED SHELL 400

Definitely better than many premium priced fuels, yet sold at regular gasoline prices. High in the quality all cars need—anti-knock value

Upholstered Furniture Requires Care

Using Air Pressure to Apply an Aqueous Fluoride Solution to Moth-Proof Wool Tapestry.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

Furniture upholstered in wool or mohair is attractive, and many people buy it for their homes. Unless proper precautions are taken, however, injury by moths is apt to occur. The bureau of entomology of the United States Department of Agriculture believes that there is no reason why woolen covers cannot be maintained in good condition indefinitely if certain control measures are used.

The adult insect, or clothes moth, which may be seen flying about in practically any season of the year in heated homes, does not eat the fabric. It is seeking a good place to lay its eggs, so that when the larva or worm hatches it will have its favorite food right at hand. The larvae eat the fabric on the surface of the furniture and also get under the covers and eat the wool threads that go through to the back.

Many manufacturers now treat fabrics to be used for furniture covers to make them resistant to moth attack. Another precaution taken by the manufacturer is to place a layer of cotton batting between the padding and the cover of the piece of furniture. It is essential that this layer of cotton batting should be continuous, without breaks through which the moths can work their way to the under side of the fabric. Fumigation at the warehouse or by the furniture dealer is also used in the piece when it is delivered to the purchaser.

In buying upholstered furniture, the choice of leather, silk, cotton, linen, or rayon covers eliminates the moth problem from the start. Feather cushions are not immune to moth damage, but are rarely disturbed. If mohair or wool covers are selected, it is well to inquire whether they have been treated ed with a moth-proofing solution, and how the padding underneath them is protected. Fumigation might also be insisted upon.

However, paradichlorobenzene crystals, properly used, are safe and fairly effective for home treatment if the piece of furniture to be fumigated can be tightly wrapped in blankets for a day or two. Directions for the use of this substance are given in Farmers' Bulletin 1655-F on the control of moths in upholstered furniture. It may be obtained free from the United States Department of Agriculture. The bulletin also mentions a number of moth-proofing solutions which can be applied without injury to furniture coverings.

Story for Children When the Sandman Comes

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

The fairies had a party today—a dance party. It was a turkey dinner, but it was a different kind of a turkey dinner from any you could imagine. All the fairies are feeling quite weary now from their wonderful day but they will soon be fast asleep.

However, that is not telling you about the party.

In the first place they had a guest of honor, I don't believe you could ever, in a hundred years—or at least fifty—guess the name of the guest of honor.

Well, it was none other than Mr. Turkey Gobbler himself. He came with his chest way out, strutting proudly along, followed by some of his family.

They called a turkey dinner party one which had Mr. Turkey Gobbler for the guest of honor, so you see it wasn't the usual kind of a turkey dinner, for Mr. Turkey walked to the party instead of being carried in on a platter!

"Well," he gobbled-gobbled, as he walked to the pine-wooded grove where the fairies were going to have their dinner party, "these silly people think they have paid me an insult when they have said I was proud and vain and—tough—not good to eat!"

"Ha, ha, gobbles-gobbles, as if I cared about being tough. In fact I like it.

"That's why I'm the guest of honor here!"

"Yes," he continued, "haven't I a right to be vain? I am at a dinner party myself as a real guest of honor, admired for the way I walk and chatter, and not for the way I'm cooked on a platter."

"I almost could sing a song about that for joy!"

And then, would you believe it, that silly old turkey began to sing—or shriek we would have called it.

"Gobble, gobble, gobble," he called, and he thought it was a perfect song.

"Good health, my dears," he went on, "is most important. Of course it is well enough to have turkey dinners.

"I am proud that they have such parties named after our family, but just the same this is a very delightful, a most enchanting, a most exciting, a most beautiful change."

"You're a fine speechmaker," laughed the Queen of the Fairies, "but dinner is ready now and we are all very hungry."

At that very moment a lovely tablecloth of new spring ferns was laid in front of all the invited guests, and such a feast as they did have of berries, nuts, and all sorts of other delightful food!

And all the time the fairies were eating and talking and laughing and chattering and not for the way I'm cooked on a platter."

"I almost could sing a song about that for joy!"

Something exceedingly rare in the lamb world, is when a ewe gives birth to 5 lambs, and when it comes to pigs, 20 is going some for one litter, such is recorded in Defiance county.

Cecil Rhodes, 26, Hicksville, employe Auburn Auto, and Della Rhoades, 20, of Spencer, have secured license to wed. Cecil is the son of Burton Rhodes and wife, who lived near Spencer for years.

Hulbert N. Rummell has petitioned the DeKalb circuit court for the appointment of a guardian for his sister, Mrs. Louie Beam of Spencer, who, because of infirmities, is incapable of managing her own affairs. Atkinson & Husselman are the petitioner's attorneys.

Tuesday morning, enroute to St. Joe, the attention of Chas. Harter a section hand, was attracted by a peculiar noise. He was west of the Wm. Staman country home, stopping his car, he went to the ditch nearby, and here stranded on dry land was a loon. When standing erect these birds are nearly 3 feet long, and when an adult has an iridescent black head, long bill, is a fish eating diving bird, with spotted black back and wings and white underparts. The bird was unable to raise from dry land. He brought the bird to town and in the evening took it home. It surely was a beautiful specimen.

The Home Bureau Club urges all mothers interested in the proper feeding of infants, to attend their meeting Friday, April 17, at the high school gym.

Activities have been renewed on the road in Spencer township from the Hadsell bridge south to Walker Corners. The bridge at the north end is being repaired. When the road is graded it will receive considerable travel from the north.

Walter W. Mountz, former county clerk died at his home in Flint, Mich., of cerebral hemorrhage Saturday morning. He went to bed as well as usual and about midnight Friday was stricken with the fatal disease. At 6 A. M. he became unconscious and expired at 10 o'clock. The body was returned to Garrett and burial was made Tuesday.

The death of Dr. Farnes Mark Hines, of Auburn came as a shock to the entire county, passing away Sunday, at 10:30, of acute nephritis after an illness of only five days. He was a prominent physician, and democratic worker. He served two terms as county treasurer, beginning in 1900.

Dr. Hines was born in Jackson township, this county, the son of S. Henry and Sarah Hines. He was educated in the county schools and studied medicine in the old Fort Wayne medical college and upon graduation he returned to Auburn and had practiced there since. Dr. Hines married Anna Carper on March 29, 1885. She died on March 28, 1928. Of that union four children survive. They are Drs. Archer and Dorsey Hines, Mrs. R. E. Stone of Detroit and Mrs. H. M. Casebeer of Auburn. The funeral was held Tuesday afternoon.

Race to the Crossing—Usual Result

The old story of the race to the crossing is told again with graphic details in this photograph. A Charlotte (N. C.) street car and a railroad train called it a tie. Forty-three persons were injured.

Scenes and Persons in the Current News

1—Admiral Plunkett, World war leader, buried at Arlington. 2—Three men escaped with minor injuries when this biplane crashed into an artificial mountain at a scenic resort near Portland, Ore. 3—Demetri Burillean, who has just been dismissed as governor of the Bank of Rumania.

Knotty Problem for the Court

A father who asks the court to prevent his son from becoming an ungainly giant, and a mother who doesn't care how large her son grows, so long as he remains healthy and bright, leave the decision to a Los Angeles judge. The boy is Edward Roome, fourteen, over six feet tall and weighs 235 pounds.

Elinor Smith's Plane After Crash

Straight up on its nose is this plane of Elinor Smith after it crashed 25,000 feet with its pretty girl pilot while she was trying to establish a new altitude record for women at Roosevelt field, L. I. Strangely enough, Miss Smith was uninjured in the crash, suffering only from a bad "shaking up." The accident is attributed to the engine "going dead" in the rarefied atmosphere.

Lesson for April 19

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS

LESSON TEXT—Luke 16:19-31.
GOLDEN TEXT—And yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.
PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Teaches Sharing.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Teaches Sharing.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Curse of Selfishness.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Right and Wrong Uses of Wealth.

In this lesson we are afforded a look into two worlds where we see extremes of character and conditions. In this present world we see a rich man reveling in luxury and a poor man in sore affliction, begging at the rich man's gate. In the other world we see the same men with reversed positions—the erstwhile beggar enjoying the richest blessings of heaven while the former rich man suffers the torments of hell. These lives were intended to be representative. The rich man descends from the highest pinnacle of worldly enjoyment to the depths of endless misery. The poor beggar ascends from utter wretchedness and misery to the loftiest heights of bliss.

I. Contrasted Lives (vv. 19-21).

1. The rich man (v. 19).

He lived in a mansion secluded from the common people. He was clothed in costly raiment. He fed upon the richest food that could be provided. It should be borne in mind that this man is not accused of having unlawfully gained his riches. His sin was selfishly to indulge his appetites without consideration of others.

2. The beggar (vv. 20, 21).

He was laid at the rich man's gate in the hope of getting at least the crumbs from his table. No consideration was given him by the rich man, and even the dogs of the street were more kind to him. Lazarus means "God is a help," indicating that a godly life showed through his poverty.

II. Contrasted Deaths and Burials (v. 22).

1. The beggar.

He was found dead and his body hurried off to a pauper's grave. No notice was taken of it by the world, but that he was no longer to be seen at the gate of the rich man.

2. The rich man.

He also died. His gold could not bribe the messenger of death. Doubtless a costly funeral was held.

III. The Contrasted Destinies (vv. 22, 23).

1. The beggar.

He was at once carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom. The souls of believers are especially cared for at the hour of death. They go immediately to be with the Lord. Destinies are determined in this life.

2. The rich man.

Though he had an elaborate burial, he lifted up his eyes in hell "being in torment." The positions of these men are now reversed—the poor man is in the company of "just men made perfect," and the rich man is stripped of his purple and fine linen and cast into hell.

IV. The Reality and Fixeness of Life Beyond the Grave (vv. 24-31).

1. The cry for mercy (v. 24).

Dives, which is the Latin name for "rich man," was now willing to claim relationship to Abraham. He is keenly conscious, and the appetites which controlled him while on earth were still with him.

2. Abraham's reply (v. 25).

This reply cast the matter back upon the man's memory. He said: "Son, remember! The lashings of a guilty conscience will be most real in hell. The one supreme thing to remember will be the cause which led to the awful destiny. Then, too, it will be remembered that the doom is just."

3. The fixeness of life beyond the grave (v. 26).

Human destiny is fixed by the choices made during the earthly life. When one passes out of this life he enters into a state and condition which is unchangeable.

4. God's Word the all-sufficient light (vv. 27-31).

Dives requested that Lazarus go on an errand of mercy to his brethren. He regarded the testimony of a spirit of more value than the Word of God. Many today are more willing to trust the rappings of a ghost than the sure Word of God. Abraham declared that God's Word is sufficient—that those who reject Moses and the prophets would not repent though visited by one who had risen from the dead. The greatest miracles will not affect the hearts of men who reject the Bible. Lost men will learn too late the value of the soul.

Search the Bible

If the people who are perpetually running about to meetings for crumbs of help and comfort, would only stay at home and search their Bibles, there would be more happiness in the church, and more blessing in the world.—F. B. Meyer.

Most Sacred Channels

I begin to suspect that the common transactions of life are the most sacred channels for the spread of the heavenly leaves.—G. MacDonald.

TALES... of the TRIBES

By EDITHA L. WATSON

The Osage

After mankind had ascended from the lowest of the four upper worlds to the highest, where they received souls, they descended again and came to the red oak tree on which the lowest world is supported. They climbed down the branches of the tree, and divided into those who kept to the left, the peace people, and those who kept to the right, the war people.

The peace people ate only vegetables, the war people meat. Later, they gave each other some of the different foods, and thus all came into possession of a variety.

Later, the two bands met a third, very warlike folk, but managed to make peace with them and admitted them into the tribe. And this, briefly, is the origin of the Osage.

Legend also relates that later the Osage were living on the banks of a great river, which overflowed, sending the people panic-stricken in four directions: to the top of a hill, to an upland forest, to a thorny thicket, and to the foot of the hill. These last two united. Even at present, the Osage are divided into three communities, in commemoration of this event. The "Dwellers-Upon-the-Hilltop" have their village at Grayhorse; the "Dwellers-in-the-Upland-Forest" at Hominy, and the "Dwellers-in-the-Thorny-Thicket" and "Dwellers-Below" at Pawhuska.

Marquette noted them on his map of 1673, and they remained where he found them for about two hundred years, when they moved westward.

This tribe was always at war, and most of the neighboring Indians held them on terror on this account. Still, they could be generous, for the Illinois, who had been their foes, fled to the Osage for protection when driven west of the Mississippi by the Iroquois.

Lewis and Clark have recorded that nearly half of the tribe migrated to the Arkansas river, and took its name. They give the numbers of the Great and Little Osage and the Arkansas band as more than 1,300 warriors.

The three divisions of the tribe which date from legendary days have always been kept separate, and each division had certain functions. For instance, if an enemy should slip into the camp circle and appeal to the chief of the peace people, he was in duty bound to defend him. The more peaceful ceremonies were delegated to this division, such as the naming of children. The war people, which included the third division, took charge of the warlike duties of the tribe.

Certain families carried on the manufacture of war pipes, mocassins, etc., and herds were chosen from certain other families. While these smaller "offices" were hereditary, the highest place in the tribe, that of head chief, was elective. Thus, on the death of a head chief, four candidates were named by the leading men, and one of these was chosen as head chief.

The Osage were visited by Capt. Zebulon M. Pike in 1805. This famous explorer stayed more than a week in their villages on the Little Osage river, and mentioned them in the report of his expedition.

Most of what is now Missouri and the northern part of Arkansas, the property of the Osage, was ceded to the United States by treaty in 1808. This left them with all of Oklahoma north of the Canadian and Arkansas rivers, a not inconsiderable property, but they reduced the extent of this by further treaties, until the limits of their reservation were fixed. Their agent reported the land as being "poorly adapted for civilizing purposes," as there was but one small fertile valley on the reservation, but since then minerals and especially oil have been discovered on the Osage land, with the result that, as far back as 1900, the Osage were the richest Indian tribe in the United States, having funds of more than eight and a half million dollars in the United States treasury, which brought them an income of nearly half a million a year. Pasturage leases added to this amount.

The Osage are rapidly decreasing in numbers on account of intermarriage with the whites. The census of 1910 gives only 825 as full bloods out of 2,100 enrolled as Osages, and it is even said that many of the 825 are of mixed blood.

That buffalo was of great value to the Indian is not doubted. Mosteives lists the ways in which this animal is of use: "Besides their meat, it furnishes them liberally what they desire for convenience. The brains are used to soften skins, the horns for spoons and drinking cups, the shoulder blades to dig up and clear off the ground, the tendons for thread and bowstrings, the hoof to give the arrow feathering. From the tail hair they make ropes and girths; from the wool, belts and various ornaments. The hide furnishes saddle and bridle, tether ropes, shields, tents, shirts, footwear, and blankets, to protect them from the cold."

To Restore Lee Birthplace

It is the intention of the Daughters of the Confederacy to restore Stratford-on-the-Potomac, the birthplace of Robert A. Lee. It is said to be the largest mansion in the state of Virginia and is the only example of this particular old English type of home in America. It was built in 1729 and 1730.

I HAVE THE SAME KIND OF WASHER AS YOU—WHY AREN'T MY CLOTHES AS WHITE AS YOURS?

She envied her friend's snowy washes

"THERE'S really no secret about it, you know. You could get gleaming, snowy washes, too—if you used Rinso. Its thick suds are different. They're so rich and lively, they loosen dirt. And my clothes come so white, you don't even need to boil."

Great for tub washing, too

The makers of 40 famous washers recommend Rinso. Just as wonderful for tub washing—soaks out dirt, saves scrubbing. How fast saves the clothes!

Cup for cup, Rinso gives twice as much suds as lightweight, pulled-up soaps, even in hardest water. Get the BIG package. You'll like Rinso's lively suds for dishes, too!

"There should be another man posted here."

There was. He looked and grinned and waved and followed as Ray belatedly out his instructions. But a motor boat has no tires. Ray was not anxious to begin a running battle. If he could get beyond the next landing place there might be hope that, seeing his reinforcements, their pursuers would turn tail.

Sir George looked behind him and whistled. The car they had seen had outdistanced their followers without offering battle and was tearing toward them. By some chance there were no other cars on the road in sight.

"It is going to be a close squeeze," "Slump and keep your head down, Sandison," ordered Ray, who somehow could not bring himself to say "Sir George." "What's the matter with those men of ours? Why didn't they give the three money bags?"

"Down," shouted Sir George, and followed his own advice. "What's that?"

"That was one of our tires. Oh, shades of William Penn, but we're in a tight place on this peaceful road."

The machine wobbled and wavered. The other car crept up on them, but the men in it did not shoot again, evidently confident that they had them completely in their power.

Ray was bumping along to the accompaniment of a sort of chant. "Keep your head down. If I can only make it to that corner. Oh, ham and onions! How mad I would be if they stop us this side. What's that?"

The oddest sound seemed to fill his ears. In a moment he realized what it was and then despite the gravity of the situation, he laughed aloud. They had turned a corner and before them streamed what seemed a small army of cars, almost all of that cheap, but useful make which had made its producer both famous and rich. Each car held four men and every man except the driver was armed.

"If you can laugh now," exclaimed Ray, "you have your nerve with you! Look!"

Their pursuers had rounded the corner confidently, counting on their superior car and speed. The motor boat was audible a little distance away, closely following. It dawned on Ray, who had been wondering why they bothered with a motor boat, that they had planned it as a way of escape. If things got too hot, and their three shot up, they could escape in the boat to where a car was waiting further down the canal.

But by the advent of Ray's guard the situation had utterly changed. The workmen's cars, as they came, had opened out their formation and now formed a long alley, one on each side through which moved the disabled car in which Sir George and his companion sat. As their car wobbled slowly forward the other cars closed in behind it, three deep. Sir George and his companion went on their way through this line of cars toward the camp. As they did so their pursuers fled, and the foremost workers returned their fire.

"Dash it," Sir George yelled to Ray, "I can't let the men take the risk! He climbed out of the car. Ray followed him.

The enemy car turned and, to Sir George's amazement, swerved towards the canal without firing again. Ray called in two languages, Italian and English: "Don't shoot!" and ran to the front to count the casualties. One of the workers had been hit by a splinter when his windshield was shattered, but he was not dangerously wounded.

At least one of the enemy had been hit and two of their tires were punctured. "They're done for," Ray shouted. "Steady!" he called to the workmen nearest him, who had begun to edge toward the enemy. "We're only here to keep the money out of their clutches. The police will do the chasing."

Sir George gave a quick exclamation. The motor boat had reached the spot where the disabled car waited and at once the men in it jumped out and ran toward the canal bank. One of them limped and another had a wounded hand.

The Italian and negro workmen gave a roar of disgust and plied with Ray to let them get at the boat. Ray was obstinate. He pointed out the men on the boat armed and ready for trouble.

Sir George growled aloud, and ran toward one of the workmen's cars. "I can't let them get away. Let's follow them."

The first motor cycle policeman came flying down the road. Ray shouted and pointed at the motor boat. The motor boat was well on its way as the policeman passed Sir George. "The locks!" The policeman called as he dashed past. "Get word to the locks. They can't pass them."

Ray and Sir George jumped into one of the smaller cars and sped up to the works.

Panding, Ray hung himself on the telephone and talked rapidly. When he looked up his companion was divesting himself of the money belt. "Call them in," he suggested, "pay them all now and tell them Mr. Mac-Beth will hear what they have done for him today. Oh, I say, Browne, if we'd only gone after them. What a day it would have been!"

"I'm content to call it a day, as it is," Ray told him. "We've got the money, haven't we?"

He turned on the phone. "They left the boat before they got to the locks, climbed into a car that is still dodging the police. I've told them to relay any message that comes through to MacBeth's island. The new tires are on and I'm all set to go."

Sir George looked at him a little shyly. "I say, Browne," he said, "would you mind not saying much about this affair to the women. Be decently awkward, you know, if my stepmother gets word, there was any shooting."

Ray burst out laughing. "Daredevil George!" he shouted, "who wanted to stage a running fight along the canal, afraid of his stepmother?"

"True as death! I don't know Aggy—Lady Sandison—well," they climbed into the car but Ray did not start it at once. He leaned back and surveyed his companion.

"I noticed you are not crowing over the success of your plan," Ray told his companion.

Sir George shook his head. "Certainly not," Then he laughed. "My word, Browne, I never thought it would be like this!"

"What's that?"

"To cop MacBeth's daughter and her pile."

Ray saw what he had done then. Sir George's face whitened so that involuntarily Ray reached out a hand. "Say—"

His companion failed to see the hand. "Did you think so, too?" he asked hoarsely.

Ray hesitated. "Well, personally, I didn't think you were after the money."

"I wouldn't ask Miss MacBeth to marry me if Sandisrae were in ruins and I hadn't a penny to buy myself food."

"That point being clear and understood," Ray left her car with Bonaventura and walked up behind Ray, "you stay in that car and go home while Ray rides with me. Father's heard from New York. The New York car was held up on the Jersey meadows. There was a running fight. One of the car crew was hurt. On your way," with a surprisingly friendly smile.

Sir George wished a thousand times on the ride home that he had held his tongue. While it was just as well that the girl knew how he felt, he would have preferred that it had not been expressed to her quite so crudely and he had taken it in a decidedly sporting spirit. Yet the fact remained that it was a relief to have it clearly understood between them that there was no thought of her or her fortune in his mind.

Curiously enough, now that he had publicly relinquished her, Robert's bright head seemed to clear. He lost his fear of her and found himself wishing to see her Ray, cure free and fancy free and able to enjoy a ride in the soft dusk with a girl, whether she had millions or not. Only he assured himself that girl would never in his case be Roberta MacBeth.

There were several things Robert would have to explain before he had any confidence at all in her. The poverty-stricken heir of the Sandisrae title and lands stretched himself behind the wheel and yawned. He was tired. After all, it had been a bit of a day. It was jolly lucky for him that things had turned out as they had.

A shout from a motor cycle made him bring his car to a sudden stop. "Mr. MacBeth's secretary?"

"Yes," Sir George, automatically reacting to the excitement of the day, put a hand on his pistol pocket, until he saw the man was a policeman's uniform.

"Mr. MacBeth, will you, that the men in the motor launch left it halfway down the canal and got away in a fast car, but we're on their trail."

"Thank you, officer. Hope they get the beggars."

"Sure we'll get them. It's only a question of time."

(TO BE CONTINUED)

CHAPTER X

Roberta leaned out and asked a question of the nearest forerunner. He was an Italian and instantly burst out

English Poet Laureates Long Lived but Prosy

Post laureates of England have been a long-lived race. Doctor Bridges—was a physician, too—was eighty-five when he passed on. The ages of his three immediate predecessors in the office—Alfred Austin, Tennyson and Wordsworth—averaged eighty. Among the distinguished laureates of an earlier period, Ben Jonson lived to be sixty-three and Dryden to be sixty-nine. But the record among laureates is held by the actor-manager Colley Cibber, who died in 1757 at the age of eighty-seven.

As a poet Colley Cibber was terrible and King Edward had no great opinion of the poetry of Alfred Austin, poet laureate at the time he ascended the throne. He was not alone in that opinion.

"I always thought that Mr. Austin's appointment was not a good one," he into a stream of broken English, accompanied by illuminating pantomime. Sir George and Ray, from their vantage point near the shack, could get a vivid picture of the recent battle from the gestures alone.

This big Scotchman, Ray thought, did the trick and will get all the credit and Roberta's admiration.

"Oh, d—n the luck!" Ray snarled aloud, weary with the rapid changes of emotion this last hour had brought to him. "Snap out of it, Bonnie Dundee! Bonaventura has given you away to the girl. He's making a good speech, too. Sit up like a man and let Roberta pin your medals on."

Sir George raised himself up, but only to grasp Ray by the shoulder. "Give me the payroll receipts and this car and you can ride back with Miss MacBeth."

"Good Lord! Wait a minute!" Ray protested as he fumbled for the receipts. "What'll I tell Roberta?"

"Tell her I've gone. That will satisfy her. She isn't in the least concerned about me."

Ray regarded him curiously, shaking his head. "What's the big idea, leaving me to face the music and Roberta MacBeth alone?"

"I wouldn't do it, old fellow, if I didn't know you liked her."

"Don't you?"

"Sir George's face changed in a curious way. 'Like her! My dear fellow, she's the only thing I don't like in all America!'"

"Why, I thought you were nuts about her. It's been even betting in the office that that's why you came over."

"What?"

"To cop MacBeth's daughter and her pile."

Ray saw what he had done then. Sir George's face whitened so that involuntarily Ray reached out a hand. "Say—"

Virginia's Shrines

Westover, Virginia, Estate of William Byrd II.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

THE setting aside of three areas in Virginia as the Colonial National monument, by proclamation of President Hoover, creates what might be termed a "junior national park" that is a shrine of American history. Included in the monument is the southern half of Jamestown Island, where the first Virginia settlement was made; a portion of the town of Williamsburg; and the eastern half of Yorktown, with the surrounding battlefield area.

But there are many other shrines in this region in which so many of the leaders of the Republic lived. As one wanders up the James river, journeys up the Rappahannock, follows the Virginia shore of the Potomac, or motors along the eastern foothills of the Blue Ridge, he discovers hundreds of fine old estates that have played a part in the drama of America.

What a galaxy of gems of residential architecture greet us as we ramble around the Commonwealth!

Mount Vernon, the home of homes in American history, has been described and pictured innumerable times. Monticello, second only to Mount Vernon in its sacredness as a shrine, unrivaled in its perfection of line, angle, and curve, unsurpassed in the magnificence of its situation, has also been described by many pens. Arlington, with its memories of Robert E. Lee and its Valhalla of soldier dead round about, is a third Virginia estate well known to all readers.

But Westover—what fairer spot is there than this fine old home, with its memories of the second William Byrd and his fair daughter Evelyn? From its prehistoric clasp of the golden necklace of the James, it has been called. As one sits on that glorious lawn, with its magnificent trees, two centuries old, history recreates itself.

Courty cavaliers in brilliant coats, flowing ruffs, satin knee breeches, and with silver, jeweled, jeweled swords, and golden snuff boxes, gather where and pay court to lovely ladies with powdered hair, patches, fans, and dresses of flowered brocade, who come and go as in the days when William Byrd II was known as the Black Swan and Evelyn's beauty was the toast of two continents. We see again William Byrd III, in his scarlet regimentals, riding off to his command in the French and Indian war, or in his lordly coach-and-six with liveried outriders, going with his ladies to visit their neighbors at Shirley and Brandon and other seats of the "River Barons."

The fine old mansion, chaste and beautiful in its design, mellowed to old rose in hue, lovingly restored by its present owners, stands in its rich glory as in any period of its history, in the midst of its magnificent river-bordered, yew-and-elm-studded lawn.

Shirley and Brandon. Shirley is its neighbor up the river. Brandon down the stream. Who that has visited Shirley could ever forget this fine old three-story, dotter-wind-down, square-built mansion? For nearly two centuries it has sheltered hundreds who have played distinguished roles in the drama of American history. Here came, to wed the lovely Elizabeth Hill, John Carter, son of "King" Carter of Charleston who owned a quarter of a million acres of Virginia's choicest land and built a dozen baronial seats for his many sons and daughters; and here also came Light Horse Harry Lee to woo and win the fair Anne Hill Carter.

Brandon, seat of the Virginia Harrisons—who can describe its simple beauty, with its two wings, its central tower, its connecting wings, and its delightful garden, as it has been restored by its present owner?

A list of the flowers that grace the river garden of Brandon would constitute a catalogue of all thriving in the fertile soil and genial climate of the kindly and hospitable household of the Harrisons. And here has been brought to us in a way that combines the beauty of the formal and the charm of the unstudied. A 15-foot grass walk leads down from the old garden to the river, and as one looks from the front porch of the house down through the vista formed by the trees of the lawn that was the old garden, the prospect of the James is unsurpassed.

One wishes that he could take his readers on a ramble around Williamsburg, visiting the house of George Wythe, teacher of Thomas Jefferson, John Marshall, James Monroe, Henry Clay, and Edmund Randolph; stopping at Bassett hall, where Tom Moore wrote "The Firefly," and inspecting the John Page home, where the plot of Mary Johnston's "Audrey" was laid. And one regrets that space limitations permit only a mention of Claremont Manor, Upper Brandon, Weyanoke, Flower de Hundred, and Amphill, colonial gems come down through the ages to us.

On the Upper Neck. But the Northern Neck calls us. Here is Sabin Hall, with a situation as beautiful and a garden as delightful as can be found in all America. Flower de Hundred, built for his son London, one of whose wives was Maria Byrd of Westover.

At Mount Airy, with its three houses grouped about a central axis and connected by curved, covered ways, always have lived the Taylors, intermarried with the Platters and the Ogles of Maryland. The race horses of Governor Ogle and those of Colonel Taylors were the most famous of the early American turf, and Colonel Taylors' race track brought the elite of two colonies together.

Farther up the Northern Neck we come to Stratford, ancestral home of the Lees of Virginia. From its precincts went two signers of the Declaration of Independence. Descendants of the original owner have included governors of Virginia and Maryland, generals in four wars, members of constitutional conventions, and many another whose name graces the pages of American history.

Today it stands as a pitiful relic of its one-time glory, but a Connecticut chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy has recently acquired it and is making plans for its restoration to the aspect of days when Richard Henry Lee, Francis Lightfoot Lee, Light Horse Harry Lee, and Robert E. Lee were born there.

On the north bank of the Rappahannock, at Fredericksburg, stands Chatham, the home of the Fitzhughs. There George Washington courted Martha Custis, there Robert E. Lee courted Mary Randolph Curtis, there Abraham Lincoln visited the Army of the Potomac.

And across the river is the little home where lived Mary Washington, Mother of the First President. One loves to visit the shrine.

Where Mary Washington Lived. When George Washington reached maturity and left the Ferry farm, where he had spent most of his tender years after leaving Wakefield, his sister Betty invited their mother to come to Kenmore, nearby, which Fielding Lewis had built for his bride. Her answer was: "My wants are few. I feel perfectly competent to take care of myself." So she moved, instead, to the little cottage because "George thought it best."

History raises the curtain and gives us a glimpse of her life there. Her daughter frets at not hearing news of her brother George at the front, and it is admonished that "the sister of the commanding general should be an example of faith and fortitude." Lafayette visits her. He enters her garden by the side gate and finds her raking leaves and wearing a lacy-woolsey dress and a broad-brimmed hat over a pleated undercap. She takes his hands in both of hers. "Ah, Marquis," she exclaims, "you have come to see an old woman. But I can make you welcome without changing my dress."

Speaking of this visit later, Lafayette declared that he had seen "the only Roman mother living at this day."

Clerk, DeKalb Circuit Court.
Atkinson & Husselman,
Attys. for Plaintiffs. 1513.

OLEN SHANK GOES TO FEDERAL PENITENTIARY

A sentence of two and a half years in the federal penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kan., was passed upon Olan Shank of near Butler, by Judge Edward J. Moinet in the United States court at Detroit Wednesday.

Shank was convicted of stealing a Ford car belonging to Eugene Prickett in Auburn last November. He drove the machine to Jackson, Mich., and turned it over to Mrs. Alva Franklin, 19, and her sister, Mrs. Nellie Summit, 21, both of Fort Wayne. They proceeded to Detroit, where the police recovered the car and arrested the young women. They furnished the clues that led to Shank's arrest.

Mrs. Franklin and Mrs. Summit were at first suspected of the theft, but they convinced the police that they were not guilty. Mrs. Franklin was released, but her sister was held until Wednesday as a material witness against Shank.

Shank first got into trouble a few years ago by stealing chickens.

REPORT OF APRIL MEETING OF BROTHERHOOD

THE April meeting of the Wittenberg Brotherhood was held on the eighth of the month at the Christian Church at Butler with Rev. S. R. Aldrich as host.

The meeting was called to order at 8:10 P. M. by the President, C. H. Fetter. After the singing of several hymns Rev. Orville Heltzel conducted the devotional service choosing the lesson from the 13th chapter of St. John. At the conclusion of this service Rev.

Aldrich led in prayer.
Atty. H. C. Springer as speaker of the evening then gave an interesting and instructive address on the taxation question as it applies to the state government. Mr. Springer's able discourse on this subject was timely, very essential and was warmly appreciated by all present.

The members were next favored by a piano solo by Marion Diehl, a young lad of ten years who did remarkably well.

Rev. Aldrich then invited the assemblage to the basement of the church where the ladies of the church had a bounteous repast in readiness. Ample justice was done to this feature of the program, and a cheer was given the ladies and the pastor for the splendid manner in which they entertained.

The May meeting of the Brotherhood will be held at the U. B. Church at Butler and all members are urged to be present.

MOTHER'S DAY MAY 10, 1931

Mother's Day this year falls on May 10, the second Sunday of the month, according to the annual custom started by Anna Jarvis of Philadelphia a number of years ago. It is a day that is set aside for special observance in nearly every church in the United States.

Whether your mother is still with you or has gone to her eternal rest, you owe her a debt of gratitude that you can never finish paying.

Mother's Day is set aside as the one day of the year when all right-thinking men and women let their thoughts dwell upon the undying devotion their mothers gave and the innumerable sacrifices they made for them.

They thank God, every one of them, that He gave them a good mother and they find that the best place to show their appreciation is at the church—where she would want them to be on this Sunday.

Remember your mother especially on this day, send her a remembrance if you can, wear a carnation for her—and come to church and thank God for the noble woman He gave to be your mother.

If I could concentrate all the fragrance of the world into one flower I would call it a rose.

If I could concentrate all the melody of the universe into one composition, I would call it the Messiah.

If I could concentrate all the tenderness and sympathy of the world into one endearing term, I would call it Mother.

We will have special services appropriate for Mother's Day at Spencerville and Scipio Churches. Won't you come for Mother's sake?

Rev. Homer Studabaker.

GARRETT MAN KILLED BY FALLING WALL

Andrew Gard, who went thru severe fighting in the World War with the loss of one eye and part of his skull, was fatally injured Sunday in a freak accident as he walked down North Randolph Street at Garrett.

The high wind, moving unimpeded through broken windows at the rear of the Miller building, pushed the entire front of the structure above the first floor forward, and it fell on Gard, breaking two vertebrae. Gard was in the midst of a great mass of bricks that were swept loose by a heavy gust of wind. He lived only two hours and was able to say just a few words.

CRASHES WITH COUNTY HIGHWAY TRUCK

T. G. Hereford, sales manager of the Auburn Stoker corporation was fatally injured Friday afternoon in an automobile crash at the intersection of state highway 27 and the Morningstar Road, north of the Auburn Country Club.

Mr. Hereford in a Chrysler automobile collided with a truck of the DeKalb county highway department driven by Oscar Fulk of Waterloo. He was taken to the Dr. Bonnell Souder hospital suffering from fractures of both jaws, a broken nose and other injuries. He died Sunday at Ann Arbor, where he was taken by his father upon his arrival from St. Louis Saturday.

Mr. Hereford was on his way to Waterloo at the time of the accident and the motor truck came from the east. It is believed that when he saw a collision could not be avoided he slumped down in his seat to prevent being cut by glass and that the steering wheel crushed his jaw.

Traffic was held up both ways on the state road until Mr. Hereford could be released and the car and truck removed.

HELP THE SALVATION ARMY TO SERVE THE POOR

Through the educational department of the township Sunday School work, an effort is being launched by the Sunday Schools, to make this week a home missionary week, when every home is asked to make a clean-up of their scrap paper, magazines, rags, cast-off clothing, shoes, hats, caps, furniture, bedding, rugs, carpets, dishes, stoves, books, etc., for the use of the Salvation Army of Ft. Wayne which is saving the poor and needy.

If you live in town and wish to have someone call for your donation, phone The News and we will have someone call and bring it in for Saturday when the Army truck will call for same.

Already some papers, rags, clothing and furniture have been brought in, and we are sure every home can assist in one way or another.

On Sunday morning, May 3, the members of the Army of Fort Wayne will be in St. Joe at the M. P. Sunday School and appear on the program and many from the other churches will attend following their Sunday School hour.

Your assistance will be appreciated by those in charge of missions in the local schools.

Look about and see what you can bring in, and do it now.

HAROLD BAKER GIVEN SURPRISE OF HIS LIFE.

Last Tuesday evening being the eighteenth birthday of Harold Baker, he was urged to spend the evening away from home, only to receive a message later calling him back. Upon his arrival he found that the senior class with a number of other guests including Mrs. DeVore had taken possession of his home.

The evening was spent playing card games and with music on the radio. Refreshments consisting of ice cream, cake and whipped cream cakes were served by Mrs. Baker assisted by Mrs. Borthwick, after which Carlton Shull delighted the crowd with an impromptu dance. It was then decided it was time for Harold to go to bed, so accordingly the boys of the party attempted to put him there, but missed the bed entirely and Harold found himself under it instead of in it, but with no hard feelings.

The party broke up with expressions of appreciation for a happy evening and the wish that Harold may enjoy many more as pleasant birthdays.

Lesson for May 3

JESUS IN THE HOME OF ZACCHAEUS

LESSON TEXT—Luke 19:1-10.
GOLDEN TEXT—For the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Makes a Bad Man Good.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Makes Zacchaeus a Friend.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Beginning a New Life.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Repentance and Restoration.

I. Jesus Passing Through Jericho

Jericho is noted as a stronghold of the Canaanites which was miraculously delivered into the hands of Israel in response to their faith, Joshua 6, and also for the faith of Rahab which saved her from destruction with the city Heh. (11:31). Two notorious sinners, Rahab and Zacchaeus, were saved at Jericho.

II. Zacchaeus Seeking Jesus (vv. 2-4).

1. His object (v. 3).
He sought to see who Jesus was. He doubtless had heard of Jesus' kind treatment of publicans, so was prompted to see what kind of a man he was.

2. His difficulties (vv. 2, 3).
(1) His infamous business (v. 2).
He was a tax collector of the Roman government. The very fact that a Jew held such an office under the hated Romans would make him extremely unpopular. Then, since he was rich, it was evident that he had practiced extortion in collecting taxes. By virtue of his traitorous act in accepting such an office from the Romans and his extortion in collecting taxes, he was ostracized from society. Many men have a hard time in coming to Christ because of their unpopular business relations.

(2) His shortness of stature (v. 3).
He was too small to crowd his way through to Jesus, and being hated by the people, they had thrust him aside, no doubt, with taunts and jeers.

3. His persistence (v. 4).
He ran before the multitude and climbed up into a tree. What he lacked in stature he was determined to make up by the height of the tree. Zacchaeus seems to have been of that temperament which knows no defeat. The obstacles placed before him he brushed aside; those he could not brush aside he climbed over, his heart set upon the goal.

III. Jesus Finding Zacchaeus (vv. 5, 6).

While Zacchaeus was trying to see Jesus, Jesus was looking for him. This is always the case, when desire is stirred up in a heart to see Jesus, Jesus is seeking that one. When Jesus saw him he commanded him to come down from the tree and declared his intention to go home with him. Jesus called him by name, but did not utter a word which would humiliate Zacchaeus. Jesus knew his heart's desire and dealt with him accordingly. All souls who earnestly seek Jesus shall be found of him. Zacchaeus quickly responded. He came down, and with joy received Jesus. He acted wisely in that he did not hesitate. A moment's indecision and waiting would have kept Zacchaeus from Jesus—from Jesus and salvation.

IV. Zacchaeus' Conversion (vv. 7-10).

His conversion was sudden and thorough. He was converted before he reached the ground.

1. What the crowd said (v. 7).
They said just what they say today when sinners come to Christ. They call to mind the man's former sins. They also reproached Christ saying that he had gone to be a guest with this notorious extortioner, the tax collector. That for which they reproached Jesus was his glory. His supreme mission was to save sinners (v. 10).

2. What Zacchaeus said (v. 8).
His conversion was thorough. It took hold upon his heart. His new life was begun with resolution and restitution. He dedicated half of his goods to the poor. The man who a little while ago was a graffer was now a generous giver. His conversion got hold of his pocketbook. His determination to make restitution wherein he had wrongly exacted taxes shows the genuineness of his conversion. While God forgets the past of the sinner when he comes to Christ, the sinner who is converted will seek to make right all wrongs, be they unkind words or unrighteous deeds. Sorrow for sin is not enough when restitution is possible.

3. What Jesus said (vv. 9, 10).
"Today is salvation come to thy house." The publican was now a child of God, a son of Abraham. Salvation is a present reality to those who receive Jesus Christ.

The Bible

Hold fast to the Bible as the sheet anchor of our liberties; write its precepts on your hearts and practice them in your lives. To the influence of this book we are indebted for the progress made in true civilization, and to this we must look as our guide in the future.—U. N. Grant.

Afflictions

Afflictions are not so much threatened as promised to the children of God.—John Mason.

TALES... of the TRIBES

By EDITHA L. WATSON

The Natchez

East of the present city of Natchez, along St. Catherine's creek, once stood nine scattered villages, comprising the tribe from which the city is named. When they first were visited by the French in 1682, there were about 6,000 Natchez—a good-sized nation.

Natchez.

It was impossible for the two races, so totally unlike each other, to remain on friendly terms, and the Natchez fought three wars with the French, the last being in 1720, which turned out to be fatal to the tribe. They split into three divisions, one of which remained near their old home. The second fled a short distance away, where, in 1731, the French again attacked them, killed many, and sold about 450 into slavery. The third and largest division joined the Chickasaw and built a village near them. Later, some of the Natchez moved into the Cherokee country, and some few survivors of the tribe are still to be found in Oklahoma.

In the early colorful days, during times of peace, the French historians found the Natchez a source of great interest. The people were tall, robust, and with a proud air; neat and agreeable. Tattooing was freely indulged in, and when a Natchez man had gained some honor or distinction, he added to his tattooed decorations, so that some of them were "inscribed" over a large area of skin. The women pierced their ears with great silts and hung ornaments in them until the lobes were greatly distended, and both men and women were partial to paint, vermilion being the most prized.

One of their less attractive customs was that of head-flattening, and the old accounts describe a baby being thus deformed: It was placed on a board, and a mass of clay was tightly bound on its head between two other boards. The poor baby cried in pain, and turned almost black, but it had to endure the pressure until its head grew into the required shape. This naturally took some time, but it is not recorded that the process had any lasting ill-effect on the Natchez children, who were bright and compared favorably with those of other tribes.

The Natchez made very good pottery and spun thread from mulberry bark, which they wove into cloth. Sometimes this cloth was covered all over with feathers; small turkey feathers being used for the common people, and swan feathers for the "aristocracy."

An aristocracy in an Indian tribe, especially one which practiced head-flattening like the savages of Africa! It is an amusing idea, of course, but the fact is that the social organization of the Natchez is the most interesting point in their story. The chiefs were called Suns, and were believed to be descended from that luminary. The next in importance were the Nobles, then the Honored class; the commoners comprised the fourth division.

Descent was reckoned on the female side of the family, as in some other tribes. A Sun's boys were still called Suns, but their children were Nobles, the children of Nobles were of the Honored class, and the children of those became commoners. On the other hand, the daughters, grand-daughters, etc., of the Sun were always of the Sun class. They were obliged, however, to marry commoner men, so that their children were of Sun blood on one hand and of the lowest class on the other.

The Natchez temple was another item of interest. It stood on a mound of earth opposite the cabin of the great Sun, which was also raised on a mound. The temple was about 30 feet square, with a door to the east, but no windows, and on the roof were three birds carved from wood. A partition divided the temple on the south side, and in the larger room was a fire, kept always burning, by pushing logs into it from three directions. Back of this was a table on which stood a basket containing bones of the last great Sun. Other baskets and some wooden images were also seen by the curious Frenchmen, who had prided into everything, and they relate that the inner room contained a stone idol.

It has been many years since the eternal fire blazed in the Natchez temple, and the idol has vanished into the obscurity of the past. There are but a few Natchez living now, far from the scenes of their tribal glory. The French came and have gone, and the Stars and Stripes float where the smoke from Indian fires once drifted. Soon the Natchez will be a memory—only the name of a city will remain, which will convey nothing of the Indians who once bore it, to the modern mind. Only the student of race-history, delving into ancient tales of still more ancient tribes, will read and be interested, or amused, or touched, according to his bent.

There is a moral here for philosophers.

Portuguese Fear Census

Census taking in Portugal spells terror to the heart of the popular masses. In an effort to set at rest people who see in the census official the forbidding figure of the tax collector, a campaign has begun to teach the significance and value of the census. After sermons in churches, hand bills, posters and newspaper stories had failed to enlighten the public, authorities had thousands of bills thrown from airplanes.

CHAPTER XI

The week-end party was in full swing. Roberta moved among a group of men, some of them new, some of them old acquaintances, but all likable. Her father, for the first time since his illness—indeed for the first time since Roberta had flouted his island—was really enjoying himself. Sir George, Roberta told herself jealously, was treated like a favored son. He was gay and charming, and as her Aunt Aggy took care to let her know "looked like one of those old gods."

"My dear aunt," Roberta protested, "you talk of nothing else but Sir George from morning till night!"

"It can't be as bad as all that!" he exclaimed, evidently alarmed. "This is the first time I have spoken about Sir George since day. There's something about the way you listen."

"There must be!" declared the mad-dened Roberta. "I'll take care to change that something, for you may as well know, now as later, that I'm sick of the sound of Sir George's name on your lips."

"Dear, dear! Have I done that for the last time? I'm terribly sorry, Roberta. I wouldn't have had that happen for a great deal. You see, it's only the last few days that I've known how he feels about you, and maybe that's why I have, without meaning to, you might say, been having him on my mind when I look at you."

"How he feels about me? Why, he hates me!" The amazed girl almost shouted it.

"He says so with his lips, maybe. There's an old Gaelic saying that the lips must defend the heart though it is breaking."

"I will say, Aunt Aggy, that a man who can defend his heart as well as Sir George does his will never be in danger of losing or breaking it."

"So you say," returned her aunt shrewdly. "Hearts aren't made of glass, it's true, my lass, but they do break. Not right away, maybe, not dropping down dead as they do in the stories, but nevertheless, they do go off, and for nothing but dead love!"

Roberta, who seemed exasperated beyond all need at this conversation, surveyed her aunt with unblinking eyes. "Well, next time you see one dying that way, call me, so that I can come and watch his death struggle."

"I have," said her aunt, "and you'll believe me."

She left before Roberta could reply. What could you do with a woman like Aunt Aggy? The idea of trying to make her pity Sir George! Or was it a scheme of Sir George's very own, to keep her from telling her father what she knew? Did he suspect Jack of giving her his true history?

not be allowed to leave her father's home today, alone. Then he had seen the blue car and known that it was Jack. He knew he must follow if he could not stop her now, and very evidently she would not listen. A cold sweat broke out on his forehead as he followed the girl down the path. He dared not leave her, but he cursed the pride and caution that had kept him from taking her father into his confidence.

The moment he had read the printed name, he had known that Jack Navarro was determined to get the girl and her money, but her attitude toward Sir George was so antagonistic that he had not quite known how to proceed. He knew he should force Roberta either to bring Jack to her father's attention or to listen while he told her what he knew of Jack Navarro. But how?

"Is your friend coming to join the party?" he asked.

"No," Roberta said defiantly. "I'm going to join him."

Sir George frowned. "I wouldn't do that. Your father will miss you—and it will look rather odd, don't you think, for a girl to be constantly in the company of a man who never comes to the house?"

Roberta swung around on him. She was furious, and she did not hesitate to show it. "So," she began in a low, deadly sweet voice, "after all, my father's secretary is his spy."

"Don't! It has an ugly sound and it isn't true. Your father laid up and I'm trying to keep him from being worried. I'm—I'm trying to look after you—for him."

"How nice of you," Roberta mocked softly. "But you are in my way, Sir George Sanderson, and I am waiting for you to move."

He paid no attention. How lovely the little devil was, and what a voice! A man might listen to its music indefinitely. "If you would only listen I think you would see what I am driving at. My dear girl, I would do a lot to save Robert MacBeth a single anxiety."

"And you think?"

"And I think you are causing him some," he said slowly. "In fact, I'm sure."

Roberta stopped and stood still for a moment. Her impulse was to cry out: "Oh, you don't really mean that father is worrying about me now?"

But her pride would not allow her to do it. She would go on with what she had started out to do. She knew now that she was wrong to go. Indeed, she had all along been forcing herself to believe that it meant little to her father, in order to keep her uneasy conscience from troubling her.

Almost as was on the point of turning back. She would tell Jack he must come in and face father, even if it meant a quarrel.

"Why, He Hates Me!" The Amazed Girl Almost Shouted It.

Even as she hesitated, Sir George unwittingly spoke the word too much. "Your father may not know the man you are mentioning with, but I do, and what little I know (a not to his credit)!"

It was too much, and he looked too handsome and too confident. Roberta swung back to her former state of indignation with this man.

"I think you're mistaken," "You can see he isn't particularly anxious to be recognized, but I know him!"

Again every spark of consideration for her father or anyone else was swallowed up in Roberta's desire to crash down upon this arrogant Scot.

Roberta went down the steps slowly, in an agony of indecision, quite unaware that she was being followed. Jack had told her to say nothing to her father about his secretary's past record as he had given it to her, yet curiously enough, she doubted Jack sometimes and was not sure that she doubted her father's secretary.

Ray Brown looked after the girl and Sir George. "I wish he wasn't so good looking," he declared earnestly. "Even Roberta!" and then his jaw dropped, and he stared speechless, as did her father. Sir George, having approached Roberta, had laid his hand lightly on her arm to detain her, and she had jerked away from him.

"The lad shows very little tact," said Roberta's father. "It seems to me that Sir George has lost his sense of humor."

He had, for he had had a flash of something, which he always allowed to as that 6-4 queer inheritance from his mother's side of the family. It made him sure that Roberta must

"He must have had his reasons," she said with a sneer. "What particularly disgraceful episode in your career involves Jack?"

Sir George laughed. "Don't mislead yourself. I have nothing to fear from Nicaragua Jack, but he has a great deal to dread from me."

"Nicaragua Jack! You are crazy! Who is he?"

"A handsome young man who calls himself a Spaniard, but he's merely a hybrid American. He makes his living by tangoing with elderly ladies who can pay well for the privilege, by tween his gambling trips on the high seas. He's a very young man, but he's had a lot of experience. He slipped up badly on the last trip and was caught with the goods."

He went sprawling on his face on the grass under the trees.

The girl still stared at him, her face white. "I don't know what you are talking about. I know no one called Nicaragua Jack."

"Oh, undoubtedly he wouldn't tell you about that name. But you do know one called Jack, don't you?"

"Oh yes—several."

"Several Jacks. But only one who dances and is from Nicaragua. It was a rotten bad case that he was involved in, and there was a girl in it."

"What?"

"Tell your story as his."

"What do you mean?"

Roberta drew back slowly, away from him. "You understand me perfectly. You know what I'm talking about and I don't want to hear any more from you. In that moment she had slipped around Sir George and as he came after her she turned, thrust out her slender walking stick and deliberately tripped him up."

He went sprawling on his face on the grass under the trees.

When he was up on his feet again, he heard a light laugh and he saw that already Roberta had gained the road above him and was waving to the blue-car which was coming rapidly down the road.

It was useless to go after her, and he might be mistaken in thinking that meeting between the girl and Jack of so much significance, but even as he thought this he caught sight of a bag set down in the shade of the sycamore. Why a bag, unless it meant she was going to leave the island and her father once and for all?

With a quick exclamation, Sir George picked up the bag and went hurriedly back over the bridge. He meant to get a car and go after her. He could not tell the girl, go now. This was probably her last chance—and his. He must overtake her, and he hoped devoutly that the thought of her father might still make her willing to return.

He went into the garage and, surprised at his own haste, took the first car that stood ready. Only when he had gone out on the road did he realize that it was Ray Brown's car that he had commandeered. Well, Ray would probably forgive him. It was now or never, if he was to stop Jack and the girl.

He had seen from the garage that the girl had come back to look for her bag. He had even laughed at the thought of how she would scowl when she found it gone. Well, he would go after her and bring her back by hook or crook to Robert MacBeth. Nicaragua Jack wasn't the son-in-law for that stout fellow.

As he clattered over the bridge the first drop of rain fell.

Gates of Death Never Opened for These Two

The prophet Elijah and Enoch never saw death, according to the Bible. II Kings 2:11 says: "And it came to pass, as they (Elijah and Enoch) still went on, and talked, that, behold, there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, which parted them both asunder; and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven." This is undoubtedly a figurative way of stating that the prophet passed from earth by miraculous translation instead of through the gates of death. Likewise Enoch, the father of Methuselah, never saw death, according to Hebrews 11:5. "By faith," that passage says, "Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and he was not found, because God translated him; for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God." This is the basis for the popular but misleading statement that Methuselah, the oldest man mentioned in the Bible, died before his father did. As a matter of fact Methuselah's father never died, according to the Biblical account. Genesis 5:25 simply says: "And Enoch walked with God; and he was not; for God took him."—Patriarch Magazine.

Costs of Wealth
Opposed to the benefits of wealth are its costs. The purpose of wealth is to benefit its owner; to cause to happen what he desires, and to prevent what he does not desire to happen. Often, however, wealth can work to his benefit without entailing some other cost. For instance, to own a house is to bring cost of maintenance.—Chicago Post.

About Ourselves
While it is illuminating to see how environment molds men, it is absolutely essential that men regard themselves as molders of their environment.

SIAM a Modern State

Buddhist Priest in Front of Temple, Siam.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

SIAM, whose sovereign, King Prajadipok, is visiting the United States, is one of the few important independent countries now ruled by an absolute monarch.

But despite the fact that there is no parliament and no check on the powers of the king, Siam is in many ways a strikingly modern state. The country's air mail system has operated successfully for eight years. Telephone offices number more than 475, and some 600 post offices serve every city and rural center. Wireless service handles messages to foreign countries.

Two kinds of American visitors, one good, one bad, figure prominently in the kingdom's new prosperity. Francis Bowes Sayre, the late President Wilson's son-in-law, and Dr. Hugh Smith, former commissioner of the United States bureau of fisheries, are staunch allies to Siam. The former headed a commission which secured treaties from foreign nations that removed extraterritorial rights and lifted tariff restrictions. Doctor Smith now directs the development of Siam's fishery resources.

The unwelcome American visitor is the lovely but malicious "Florida weed." The blue water hyacinth of Florida, brought to the East Indies by a flower hunter, has become a curse. Because the queen of Siam brought the first specimens for her garden from Java it is often called Java weed, but out in the country it creates a national problem by clogging the irrigation canals. It has earned the name, "blue devil."

Siam, jungles, heavy rainfall are three ideas closely associated. Why, then, must Siam build irrigation dams and canals? The answer is that the jungles are in the mountainous borderlands; the central delta plain receives an Illinois rainfall. Because the Siamese grow rice, they must have a wealth of water; hence, irrigation. The Prasaik project, with a barrage type dam, completed in 1924, serves 488,000 acres. The Subhan project, about completed, will have three times the Prasaik capacity. Other vast works are under way or have been planned.

Railroads show equal promise. Siam, by its position, is a natural railroad center of the world's densest population area, Bangkok, the capital, and Siamese metropolis, is the inevitable major railroad junction for all south and east Asia.

Railroads Are Important.
A hint of the importance to Siam of her railroads, all but one 1893, is contained in the recent report of an American agricultural expert. "I was told," he writes, "that a trainload of rice goes south daily for export to Malaya and the Dutch East Indies." Rice is to Siam what cotton is to the South.

In some superficial aspects it would seem that Siam is several laps ahead of ultra-modern America. Knickerbockers still attract attention when worn by American women in city streets, and bobbed hair only a few years ago was frowned on in some of our conservative business and social circles. Yet the Siamese women wear the knee-length garment, as does her brother, and for generations she has refused to be bothered with long hair.

She has a freedom that has developed a shrewdness and independence, in contrast to most oriental women, though she is apt to be unlettered.

Bangkok, capital of Siam, is in location the New Orleans of the East. It is in the delta of the Menam river—"the Mother of Rivers"—and dominates that stream as the Crescent City dominates the Mississippi.

In a sense it may be said that Bangkok is Siam's much more truly the Paris may be said to be France or Buenos Aires to be Argentina. In a country of 11,500,000 inhabitants it is virtually the only city. Its population is nearly three-quarters of a million, so that it is roughly midway in size between Pittsburgh and St. Louis.

It is the basis for the popular but misleading statement that Methuselah, the oldest man mentioned in the Bible, died before his father did. As a matter of fact Methuselah's father never died, according to the Biblical account. Genesis 5:25 simply says: "And Enoch walked with God; and he was not; for God took him."—Patriarch Magazine.

ocean-going vessels to unload imports and load exports; and from it in turn are distributed the supplies for the interior. The area of the kingdom is about equal to that of Spain.

Bangkok, the Capital.
In Bangkok the king and his court live, and there is operated the machinery of the country's highly centralized government. The capital has become in the eyes of the king and his people a symbol of Siamese power, and millions of dollars have been spent to beautify it and make it in many ways a convenient, modern city drained and cleaned, sparkling with electric lights, dotted with spacious parks, and crisscrossed by streets in which the clang of tramway gongs and the chug of motor cars are common sounds.

Though Siam is a tropical country, lying in the same latitude as southern India, thanks to pleasant breezes it does not experience the extreme heat known to the Indian plains. In Bangkok the heat during the dry season seldom exceeds 100 degrees Fahrenheit in the shade. In the sun it is much warmer and paper parasols are seen everywhere.

Half a century ago Bangkok was called "The Venice of the East" and fully deserved the title, for almost all transportation and movement about the city was by the river or the numerous lateral canals. Even now, though streets and highways have been built, bridges constructed and tramways laid, the waterways are still of transcendent importance in the life of the city.

Perhaps the most colorful river scene is the water market where each tiny boat with its cargo of food bears a little lamb. The market hours are from midnight until early morning. And during that period the market section of the river resembles a fairyland with its glimmering lights.

The high civilization of Bangkok has a contrast in extreme primitive conditions of other parts of the country. Curious customs abound. In upper Siam tea is picked for chewing instead of being used as a beverage. First the leaves are sun dried, then they are steamed to rid them of tannin. Next they are weighed down for fermentation, a process suggestive of the German preparation of sauer kraut. The substance thus formed is placed in the mouth until the juices are removed. The appearance of the individuals with the balls in their cheeks forms a never-ending source of amusement for travelers.

Famous for Lacquer.
The capital of upper Siam is Chiang Mai, famous for its lacquer ware and center of the teak tree trade. This region is a land of boats. Water routes form virtually the only lines of communication between the upper and lower kingdom.

In eastern Siam a plateau and a plain support a population which must move from swamp lands in the rainy season to higher elevations where they are barren and stony. Hence living conditions are most primitive.

The months of May mark the beginning of the all-important rice planting in Siam. King and court and thousands of subjects turn out for the Rak Na or plowing ceremony. Before the vast crowd the minister of agriculture, dignified with a hat like a spire and gowned gown, guides a huge gilded wooden plow drawn by a pair of decked bullocks. After the plowing various seeds and grains are sown before the bullocks.

Oriental still in spirit, Siam acquires modern occidental appointments of great variety. The government runs on a budget and Siam, too, has been passed through an economy program. The king, by way of example, cut his royal allowance by 8,000,000 bahts. The metric system has replaced ancient measuring units and became compulsory in 1920. Civil and commercial codes have been published; there are 38,000 Boy Scouts; the Red Cross has been organized; Chulalongkorn university, named for the monarch who, during his reign of 42 years, began the regeneration of the kingdom, enters its fourteenth year, strong and growing.

No stone actually grows. Niggerheads are rather round, smooth sandstones and boulders which were originally so called because of their fancied resemblance in color and hardness to a negro's head. The term was first used humorously, but it has become the accepted name for such rocks in many sections of the country. That niggerheads grow is a rather common belief, due probably to the fact that the frost causes them to work up through to the surface.

VISITS GRAVE OF MOTHER ON TUESDAY

Mr. and Mrs. Raymond L. Taylor, of 7251 So. Halstead St., Chicago, and Mr. and Mrs. Herman Ewert, drove to St. Joe Tuesday arriving here about noon. They came to visit the grave of Mr. Taylor's mother, Mrs. Mary E. Taylor, formerly of Chicago, and daughter of Mr. James Abel, a St. Joe resident of years past. They looked about to see if places could be recognized. It has been 25 years since Mr. Taylor had been here. They returned to their home in Chicago in the afternoon.

Keep Flavor In "Pesky Leftovers" And The Family Will Do The Rest

After the calm—the storm; after the banquet—leftovers! There always seems to be an aftermath to every sort of agreeable event, and there is no exception, as the cook knows to her gray-haired sorrow, in cooking. Proud though the roast chicken may be on Sunday, Monday morning finds it a dismembered wreck of few bones and fewer portions. The birthday cake may have gleamed amid its candles when the party began; after it, only drying-out slices remain to "mark the spot where."

The feasters go home—but the budget-watching homemaker may not leave the scraps behind them! Perhaps, then a glance at what other clever cooks have done with their feast remnants will help you with your leftovers when the fatal day comes—as come it will.

The secret of getting the nose-lifting family to eat the leftovers lies mainly in keeping them flavorful and in so changing their appearance and form that they no longer resemble yesterday's meal. To bring out the flavor of a dish that has already been subjected to a first cooking requires that only a bland and delicate frying or shortening agent be employed. To achieve this, wise cooks are using corn oil in their cooking, for it best helps to retain the original flavor.

Leftover chicken, unless there is sufficient for salad, presents a problem. Here is a delicious way to prepare it, the bread cases serving to enlarge the portions considerably.

Creamed Chicken

2 tbsps. corn oil
1 tbsps. minced onion
3 cups minced chicken
2 tbsps. cornstarch
1½ cups top milk or part milk and cream
1½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. nutmeg; Cayenne
Bread cases; Paprika.

Heat oil and cook finely minced onion and chicken in it, three minutes. Sprinkle with cornstarch and stir until blended. Add milk, salt, nutmeg and cayenne, stirring until smooth and thick. Boil three minutes. Serve in bread cases or on toast. Garnish with paprika.

Left-over vegetables may also be creamed; if enough variety of boiled vegetables remain, mix them together in a "goulash," adding a bit of minced onion and green pepper for added flavor and frying them in corn oil. Minced or chopped pimientos are an excellent means of giving color and "pep" to the creamed dishes. Since the white sauce for creaming must be thick but lumpless, a good recipe for properly mixing the cornstarch base should be in every cook's repertoire.

Creamy White Sauce

1½ tbsps. corn oil
1 tbsps. minced onion
1 tbsps. cornstarch
½ tsp. salt
Pepper; 1 cup milk.

Heat oil and cook onion in it over low fire until yellow. Stir in cornstarch and seasoning. Cook two minutes, stirring constantly. Stir in milk and stir over fire until sauce thickens. Boil three minutes and strain.

Practically any leftover meat, or even two kinds, may be combined and used to stuff peppers. The following recipe is quite as delicious used for stuffed tomatoes.

Stuffed Peppers or Tomatoes

6 green peppers
3 tbsps. corn oil
2 tbsps. onion
1½ cups soft bread crumbs
¼ cup minced chicken
¼ cup minced ham
Salt and pepper
½ cup water or stock

Cut slice from stem end of each pepper and remove seeds. Cook minced onion in the oil until yellow. Add crumbs and cook two minutes, stirring well. Add meat and seasoning. Stuff peppers with this mixture and put in casserole. Add water or stock. Bake fifteen minutes in hot oven, 400 degrees F., basting occasionally. Lower heat and bake about ten minutes more. If using this same mixture to stuff tomatoes bake only fifteen minutes.

The left-over cookies or cake, particularly that which has grown a little stale, may be made into a delicious made-in-a-minute hot sauce. Nutmeats or sliced pitted dates may be added, or the colorful coconut frostettes sprinkled over the top. Here is a favorite sauce recipe:

Caramel Nut Sauce

4 tbsps. butter
1½ cups brown sugar
½ cup light corn syrup
¾ cup evaporated milk
½ cup pecans chopped
Melt butter in saucepan, add sugar and corn syrup and boil to 230 degrees F., or until it forms a very soft ball when tried in cold water. Add evaporated milk and nutmeats and serve warm.

Carving Roast Stuffed Lamb Shoulder

Shoulder of Lamb, Boned and Stuffed.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Many people think the meat of a shoulder of lamb is just as tender and quite as delicious in flavor as the leg or any other part. The shoulder is not so easy to carve as the leg, owing to the irregular shape and central position of the shoulder blade. This difficulty about carving is easily met, says the bureau of home economics. Select a shoulder of lamb weighing from 3 to 4 pounds. Have the butcher remove all the bones, as well as the fat, or outer papery covering of skin. The bones may be saved for making soup. The shoulder may then be stuffed, and either left flat or rolled, and the pocket holds twice as much stuffing. Either of these completely boned stuffed shoulders can be carved straight through in attractive slices of part meat and part stuffing.

Wipe the meat with a damp cloth. Sprinkle the inside of the pocket with salt and pepper, pile the hot stuffing in lightly, and sew the edges together. Rub salt, pepper, and flour over the outside. If the shoulder has, only a very thin fat covering, lay several strips of bacon over to top. Place the roast on a rack in an open pan without water. Sear for 30 minutes in a hot oven (450 degrees Fahrenheit). If bacon is laid over the roast, shorten the time of searing so as to avoid overbrowning. Reduce the temperature of the oven to 300 degrees Fahrenheit, and cook the meat at this temperature until tender. From 2 1/2 to 3 hours will be required to cook a medium sized stuffed shoulder at these oven temperatures. Serve hot with brown gravy.

Mint or Watercress Stuffing.
3 cups fine, dry bread crumbs 3 lbs. chopped celery
1/2 cup fresh mint leaves, or 1 1/2 lbs. chopped onion
1 1/2 cups finely cut watercress, 1/2 tsp. salt leaves and stems 1/2 tsp. pepper
Melt one-half of the butter in a skillet and add the onion and celery.

Sauerkraut Valuable Addition to Diet

Sauerkraut has been found to make a valuable contribution to the diet. In fact, sauerkraut juice is used as an appetizer and featured on the menus of many well-known restaurants. As with cabbage in other forms, the old-fashioned way of cooking sauerkraut was to boil it for several hours. Unfortunately this method of preparation destroys the very things for which the sauerkraut is valuable. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture suggests the following recipe for preparing sauerkraut to eat with ham, corned beef or other meats.

1/2 cup butter or 1/2 tsp. celery or other fat 1/2 cup caraway seed
1 quart sauerkraut
Heat the fat in a skillet until golden brown, and add the sauerkraut and the seasoning. Mix well, using a fork to separate the kraut. Cover and cook for five minutes. Serve hot.

Trouser Suits Fine for Youngsters

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)—WNU Service.

Every mother is relieved as the time comes when her child learns to dress and undress himself and go to the toilet alone. She is then much more free for other household duties. Training in self-dressing may be started between two and three years old and a boy will soon take great pride in being independent. Good clothing design is the first requisite in encouraging self-help in dressing. Small trousers should be made with as few fastenings as possible, and these should be placed within easy reach of a two-year-old's little fingers. The child learns by repetition if the buttons and buttonholes are always in the same place at first, so it is best to use only one pattern until the little one has completely mastered its fastenings. Vary the material, color, and minor style details as much as you please.

A very good type for the first trousers of a two-to-three-year-old is here illustrated. It was designed by a clothing specialist in the bureau of home economics, United States Department of Agriculture, after studying the needs of a group of nursery school children. These trousers can be buttoned on to a blouse in the Oliver Twist style. The back and front button independently, and it is not necessary to unbutton the front in order to drop the back. Sometimes bound side openings are used. Another plan is to make a two-button drop front which fastens midway between the center seam and the side placket. This is finished with simulated welt plackets and replaces the fly. Two buttons instead of three are used on the back drop, so the child can reach them more easily. These little trousers are straight and short, well above the bend of the knee, and they have plenty of room in the seat and sufficient length in the crotch. Elbow sleeves and flat trimmings, stitched to look like a collar and cuffs are recommended on the blouse. These insure easy laundering and greater comfort when the child is playing actively than pieces that move or wrinkle. Crocheted loops are used for closing. They are made by first crocheting the edge with a single stitch, forming loops opposite the buttons with a chain stitch and finally strengthening the whole edge with a "double crocheted."

Evening Story for the Children

By MARY GRAHAM BONNER

"Now, my dear," said Grandfather Frog. "I am very grateful to you all for hopping along and telling me that you wish me these kind wishes of happy returns of the day in honor of my birthday."

"But I have just been thinking," said Grandfather Frog. "Grandfather, goop-a-room, goop-a-room," said the little frogs. "How wonderful."

"Yes," said Grandfather Frog. "I have been thinking ever since I spent the early part of the morning looking and searching for bugs and other delicacies for the party."

The frogs were pleased to hear that there was going to be a party. That pleased them immensely, and they knew that their grandfather would have found a lot of goodies for it.

"But," he continued, "when I was thinking I said to myself, that it was really very foolish to say many happy returns of the day, even though it is a pleasant thing to say."

"You see," he went on, rolling his great bulging eyes and sticking out his chest, "it is impossible to say such a thing."

"We all said it," said the little frogs. "So it is not impossible to say at all."

"That was not exactly what I meant," said Grandfather Frog. He panted for breath. He was so excited at having the little frogs listen to him so attentively and pay him all this attention.

"Goop-a-room, goop-a-room, goop-a-room," he said. "Of course you could say it without choking, I suppose."

"Because, of course, you did say it. But, at the same time, it is a senseless thing to say."

"Goop-a-Room," He Said.

"Won't you tell us why, dear Grandpa?" all the little frogs asked.

"I am so pleased you all came to me, and I appreciate it very, very much."

"But how can this day ever come back? There will be other days. Yes, other ones."

"They will be different. They may be rainy days, or sunshiny days, or days when the sun and rain are both here and there is a rainbow."

"No, I cannot have many happy returns of this day, because this day will never return."

"It makes me a little sad to think of it."

Grandfather's eyes filled with water. One tear trickled down and he swallowed it. And then he swallowed quite a few.

"I am drinking tear water," he said, "and I don't like it much."

"Ah, don't cry, Grandfather. It is true this day won't come back, but when we and others wish many happy returns of the day, we wish that happy days such as this will return."

"Oh," said Grandfather Frog, "that's a lovely thought. That makes me very happy."

And now come back in one hour for the party. I shall be all ready for it then."

It was a fine birthday party. The bugs were simply delicious.

Beefsteak Pie Liked as Dinner Dish

Round or chuck beefsteak may be used in making a beef pie—in fact, any of the less tender lean cuts will make a very good meat pie. The meat is cooked with the onion, parsley, tomatoes and seasonings, until it is tender. Then it is combined with canned string beans, covered with a crust of pastry or mashed potatoes or biscuit dough, and baked in a moderate oven until the top is a golden brown. Leftover cooked beef may be used in a similar way without simmering to make it tender. Simply combine it with the vegetables, gravy and seasonings, cover with a crust, and bake. The bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture gives the following ingredients for a beefsteak pie:

3 lbs. fat 1 pint canned tomatoes
1 lb. chopped parsley 1/2 cup water
1 medium-sized onion, sliced 1/4 tsp. salt
1 1/2 cups canned string beans
1 pound round or chuck beefsteak cut in inch cubes Few drops tabasco
3 tbs. flour

Melt the fat in a heavy skillet, add the onion and parsley and cook for a few minutes. Roll the meat in the flour, add to the fat and the onion, and brown the meat well on all sides. Pour the tomatoes over the meat, add the water, cover and simmer until the meat is tender. Season and stir in the string beans, adding some of the bean liquid if the stew is too thick. Pour the stew into a baking dish, cover with a pastry crust or mashed potatoes and bake in a moderate oven until the top is golden brown. Serve at once.

Movement of Well Water. Government geologists say that, contrary to popular opinion, water levels in wells are seldom stationary, but move slowly up and down.
